ensuing winter with her in sports, banquets, and all kinds of diversions, treating each other every day at an immense and incredible expence. Cleopatra's whole study was to amuse him, and make him pass his time agreeably. She never left him day or night, but was continually contriving new diversions, that he might not have leisure to reflect, or entertain thoughts of leaving her. Antony took particular pleasure in angling; but being one day attended with very bad luck, and much concerned to appear before the queen without his usual address and good fortune, he ordered the fishermen he had with him to dive secretly under water, and fasten to his hook some of the largest fishes which they had taken in their nets. His orders being punctually executed, Cleopatra expressed in appearance great surprize and admiration every time he drew up his line, but, being well apprized of the artifice, she caused one of her own people to dive secretly under water, and fasten to the triumvir's hook a large dry fish of that kind that was brought from the Euxine sea into Egypt. When Antony drew up his line the whole company was highly diverted at the sight of the salt fish, and could not help laughing at the triumvir's extraordinary good luck; but he putting on a serious air, the queen took him in her arms, and displaying all her charms, Leave, said she, good general, leave the angling line to us kings and queens of Pharos and Canopus; it becomes you to take cities, kingdoms, and princes.

WHILE Antony was thus amusing himself with childish and trifling diversions, Labienus at the head of the Parthian army made great conquests in Syria, which obliged him to take his leave of Cleopatra early in the spring. As he was on his march against the Parthians he altered his measures, and sailed into Italy with two hundred ships against young Octavius, with whom he soon after reconciled himself, marrying by the advice of his friends his sister Octavia, a woman of extraordinary merit, who was lately become a widow by the death of Marcellus. It was believed, this marriage would make him forget Cleopatra; but his passion for the Egyptian soon reviving, after he had spent the winter with his new wife at Athens, he hastened back to Alexandria, where he gave himself up to the same loose and scandalous way of living, which he had followed the winter two years before. On his removing from Alexandria into Syria to pursue the war against the Parthians, he left her in Egypt; but before he set out on that expedition, he sent for her into Syria against the advice of all his friends. On her arrival she influenced him him to commit such flagrant acts of cruelty and injustice, as rendered his name and government odious to the whole nation. Many Syrian lords were on false pretences put to death, that she might have their forfeited estates. Among these was Lyfanius the son of Ptolemy Mennæus, prince of Chalcis and Ituræa, whom she accused to Antony of having entered into an alliance with the Parthians. Upon this groundless accusation, Lyfanius was condemned, and his dominions granted to her. The stay he made with her before he set out against the Parthians, and the hurry he was in to return to her again, were the occasion of the many misfortunes that befel him in that unhappy expedition. On his return into Syria, having with much difficulty got to the borders of Armenia, instead of putting his army there into winter quarters, as his officers advised him, being impatient to see Cleopatra, he obstinately pursued his march, in the depth of winter, over that mountainous country then covered with snow, which, with the long march of three hundred miles he had made before he reached Armenia, so harassed his troops, that, on his arrival in Syria, he found that sixty thousand of them had perished in that destructive undertaking, mostly by the hardships they had suffered on their long and fatiguing marches °.

As soon as Antony had got back into Syria, he retired to Leucecome, a castle in Phœnice, lying between Sidon and Berytus, and there, having sent for Cleopatra, passed his time with her in feasting and revelling, without shewing the least concern for the loss of his army. Cleopatra brought with her cloaths for the poor remains of his shattered troops, which with a large donative in money were distributed among the soldiers in Cleopatra's name; though the money was given by Antony. Having thus quieted the soldiery, and made them amends for the hardships they had suffered, he returned with his beloved queen into Egypt, where he spent the remainder of the winter, in all manner of luxury and voluptuousness †. In the mean time the kings of Parthia and Media falling out about the division of the booty, which they had taken from the Romans, the latter sent an embassy to Antony, offering to join him against the Parthian with all his forces. At the same time news was brought him, that the Parthians had taken up arms against their king, and that all things were there in the utmost confusion. Hereupon Antony, resolved to lay hold of so favourable an opportunity of being revenged on that nation, hastened into Syria, with a design to make the necessary preparations for a second expedition against that formidable enemy. But Octavia being come as far as Athens in her way to Antony, Cleopatra was under no small apprehension, lest by her virtue, wisdom, and the gravity of her manners she should recover the affection of her husband, and therefore employed all her arts to prevent their meeting. She affected to die for love, and having made herself lean and pale, by taking little nourishment, she wrote to him, that his absence had cast her into a languishing condition, and that she must die unless he returned to her again. This brought the credulous lover back to Alexandria, where Cleopatra with tears, caresses, reproaches, menaces, &c. prevailed upon him to put off his expedition into Parthia, and to order Octavia to proceed no further, but to wait for him at Athens. This scandalous behaviour of Antony towards Octavia was highly resented by her brother Octavianus, and became the first cause of that war, which ended in the ruin of both these lovers<sup>r</sup>.

EARLY in the spring, Antony set out for Syria, with a design to march from thence into Parthia. Cleopatra, pretending that she could not live without him, agreed to attend him to the banks of the Euphrates. To render his absence less grievous to her, before he set out he bestowed on her all Cyrene, Cyprus, Cæle-Syria, Ituræa, and Phænice, with great part of Cilicia and Crete. But these provinces and kingdoms not satisfying her boundless ambition, she solicited him very earnestly to put to death Herod king of Judæa and Malchus king of Arabia Petræa, that their kingdoms might thereupon be granted to her. But Antony would not by any means comply with her request. However, to quiet her, he was forced to give her that part of Malchus's kingdom which bordered upon Egypt, and out of Herod's the territory of Jericho, with the balsam-gardens. These large grants gave great offence to the Roman people, and estranged their minds from Antony<sup>c</sup>. Cleopatra accompanied him as far as the Euphrates, and, returning from thence by the way of Apamea and Damascus, came to Jerusalem, where she was splendidly entertained by Herod. During her stay in that city, she pretended to be in love with the king, and employed all her charms to draw him into a criminal conversation with her. The impudence of this attempt raised in him an irreconcilable aversion to her, which, joined to the hatred he had justly conceived against her for the ill offices she had done him with Antony, provoked him to such a degree, that he resolved, now he had her in his power, to put her to death. But his friends, whom he advised with, having laid before him the fatal consequences that would unavoidably attend her death, he altered his mind, and continued to entertain her with all possible respect and splendor, so long as she staid with him, and on her departure waited on her in person to the borders of her kingdom<sup>1</sup>.

IN the mean time Antony, having, in defiance of the most sacred oaths and solemn promises, taken Artabazus king of Armenia prisoner, and thereupon reduced all that country, was preparing to return into Egypt. Before he left Armenia he agreed on a match between Alexander, one of his sons by Cleopatra, and a daughter of the king of Media, and then putting his army into winter quarters in Armenia and the neighbouring countries, he hastened back to Alexandria, which city he entered in a triumphal chariot, causing the booty; which he had taken, with king Artabazus, his wife, and children, and other prisoners of distinction, to be carried before him in the same manner as was usually done in the triumphs at Rome. Cleopatra waited for the triumphing conqueror in the forum, being seated on a golden throne, which was placed on a scaffold over-laid with silver, and surrounded by the chief lords of her court in their best apparel. To her, thus placed on her throne, was presented the king in golden chains, and with him the other prisoners. They were all ordered to kneel down before her; but not one of them could be prevailed upon to submit to an obedience so mean and degrading. When news of this triumph was brought to Rome, the Romans, who looked upon this ceremony as peculiar to their city, conceived an implacable hatred to Antony, for carrying it elsewhere to gratify a woman of a most infamous character<sup>2</sup>.

A FEW days after, Antony, having feasted at an immense charge all the people of Alexandria, summoned them to meet in the gymnasium, and there being seated on a throne of gold, and Cleopatra by him on another, he made an oration to that numerous audience, wherein he proclaimed Cæsarion, the son of Cleopatra and Julius Cæsar, king of Egypt and Cyprus in conjunction with his mother. As he himself had three children by the same Cleopatra, viz. Alexander, Pto- lemy, whom he surnamed Philadelphus, and Cleopatra, at the same time he gave to Alexander Armenia, Media, Parthia, and the rest of the eastern countries from the Euphrates to India, when they should be subdued; to Cleopatra, the twin-sister of Alexander, Lybia and Cyrene; and to Philadelphus, Phœnice, Syria, Cilicia, and all the countries of Asia Minor from the Euphrates to the Hellepont, conferring on each of them the title of king of kings. At the same time he obliged Cleopatra to take the name of Isis, assuming to himself that of Osiris; the former being the great goddess, and the latter the great god, of the Egyptians. From thenceforth they both affected to appear in public in the dress which was deemed peculiar to those deities <sup>w</sup>. By these follies he lessened his character among all wise and sober men, and daily alienated more and more the affections of the Romans from his person and cause, which Octavianus made good use of to hasten his ruin.

Antony, as soon as the season allowed him to take the field, marched into Armenia, and, having there rendezvoused his troops, began his march into Parthia, and advanced as far as the banks of the Araxes, when news was brought him that Octavianus had stirred up the people of Rome against him, and was making the necessary preparations, as if he designed to come to an open rupture with him. Hereupon he dropt the Parthian expedition, and detaching Canidius, one of his lieutenants, with sixteen legions to the coasts of the Ionian sea, he himself hastened after them to Ephesus, to be there ready at hand to act in case of a rupture, which there was great reason to expect. In this journey he carried Cleopatra with him, which proved his ruin. His friends earnestly entreated him to send her back to Alexandria, there to wait the event of the war. But the queen, fearing lest in her absence Antony should hearken to an accommodation with Octavianus and receive again Octavia, left no stone unturned to obtain leave to accompany him, and at last, having by rich presents gained Canidius to speak in her favour, prevailed upon him to comply with her request. Her chief argument was, that since she contributed most to the expences of the war, for she had advanced twenty thousand talents towards it, it was but reasonable that she should be allowed to accompany the person for whose sake she was at so great an expence. Besides, Canidius represented, that her departure would discourage the Egyptians, who made up the bulk of his maritime forces, that Cleopatra was not inferior in prudence or capacity to any of the princes in the army, and that Antony might, with great safety, depend upon and follow her advice in the most important and difficult affairs. Antony was easily persuaded, that Cleopatra's presence was necessary; and therefore repaired with her from Ephesus to Samos, whence he sailed to Athens; and in both these places lived after his usual manner, spending great part of the year in luxury, pomp, and voluptuousness *. As Antony was well acquainted with Cleopatra's character, during their stay at Athens, he began to suspect, notwithstanding the passion she professed for him, that she had a mind to poison him, and therefore would not touch any dish at their banquets till it had been tasted by others. The queen being apprised of his fears, in order to cure him of them, and at the same time convince him, that, if she harboured designs of that nature, no precaution could guard him against them, caused the flowers to be dipt in poison, of which the garlands, used according to the custom of those times in public feasts, were composed. When Antony began to be warm with wine, Cleopatra proposed drinking the flowers of their garlands, and Antony in the height of his gaiety falling in with that frolick, threw some of them into his cup, and was on the point of swallowing them with his wine, when the queen, taking hold of his arm, told him that the flowers were poisoned, and that she, against whom he took such mighty precautions, had prepared the poison; adding, that if she could possibly live without him, she could, in spite of all his care, find means to get rid of him. She then commanded a criminal, already condemned, to be brought in, and to drink the wine in Antony's cup, which immediately put an end to his life †. This fully convinced him that his fears were ill-grounded, and made him thenceforth repose an intire confidence in her.

In the mean time Antony, being informed that Octavianus was stirring up the people of Rome against him, called together the chief men of his party, and by their advice declared war against his adversary, and at the same time sent a bill of divorce to Octavia, with messengers to drive her by force out of his house at Rome. Antony's preparations for the war were so far advanced, that if he had attacked his rival without loss of time, the advantage must have been unavoidably on his side, Octavianus not being then in a condition to make head against him, either by sea or land. But Antony to gratify his luxury put off taking the field to the next year, and continued to banquet and revel at Athens with Cleopatra, as in the most peaceable times. He never appeared in public without her; even when he administered justice on his tribunal in the forum, Cleopatra was to be placed on a throne by him; when he spoke to her he gave her no other title but that of queen and sovereign, and often followed her on foot among the eunuchs, while she was drawn in a sumptuous and stately chariot. The ascendant she had gained over him inspired her with hopes of becoming one day queen of Rome; for we are told, that her usual oath was, As I hope to give law in the capitol<sup>2</sup>.

WHILE Antony was thus trifling away his time at Athens, Octavianus, having got ready a considerable fleet and army, no longer delayed declaring war, but caused it to be decreed only against Cleopatra, to avoid offending Antony's friends, who were very numerous and powerful at Rome. What chiefly provoked Octavianus was Antony's declaring Cleopatra to have been married to Julius Cæsar, and consequently Cæsarion, whom she had by him, to be his lawful son; which tended to deprive Octavianus of the inheritance of Julius Cæsar, since he held it only as his adopted son. War being declared, as soon as the season would permit, the two armies took the field, and the fleets put to sea. After several encounters both by sea and land, Antony was, at last prevailed upon by Cleopatra, contrary to the advice of Canidius, who had the chief command of the army, to put the whole to the issue of a sea-fight. This was the worst counsel that could be given him, his land-forces being far superior both in number and bravery to the enemy's; whereas he had been obliged to burn many of his ships for want of rowers and mariners, and the rest were but very indifferently manned. But Cleopatra, being well apprised that, in case Antony should be defeated, she might with greater ease and safety make her escape by sea than by land, persuaded him to engage the enemy's fleet. This memorable battle was fought on the fourth of the nones of September at the mouth of the Ambracian gulph near the small city of Actium, in sight of both armies, the one being drawn up on the north, and the other on the south, side of the streights, there to wait the event of the action, which continued doubtful, till Cleopatra, frightened with the noise of the battle, which appeared very dreadful to her, betook herself to flight before she was in any danger, and drew after her the whole Egyptian squadron, consisting of sixty large ships. Antony seeing her fly, made after her, as if he had been quite destitute of his understanding, and by his flight yielded the victory to Octavius, which till then he had disputed with great vigor and resolution. The particulars of this memorable battle we shall relate more at length in the history of Rome, contenting ourselves at present to touch upon such circumstances only as concern the affairs of Egypt.

THE next day Octavianus detached a squadron of his best sailors in pursuit of Antony and Cleopatra; but they, despairing to overtake them, soon returned to the fleet. In the mean time, the two fugitives, steering their course towards Peloponnesus, got safe to Tænarus in Laconia. Antony had been by Cleopatra's orders taken on board her ship as soon as he came up with it, but had not seen her during this whole voyage. On his first entering her ship he sat down in the prow; and there leaning his elbows on his knees, and his head on both his hands, he continued in that posture reflecting with profound melancholy on his ill conduct, and the misfortunes he had brought on himself, till he got to Tænarus, where, by the interposition of Cleopatra's women, being brought together again, they conversed and lived as usual. For Antony was so bewitched to this woman, that he still continued his fondness to her even at this time, when he had all the reason in the world to abhor and detest her, as having been the cause of his ruin in the manner we have related <sup>a</sup>.

FROM Tænarus Cleopatra sailed to Alexandria, and Antony to Libya, where he had left Pinarius Scarpus, with a considerable body of troops, to guard the frontiers of Egypt on that side. But on his landing he found, that Scarpus, with all the troops under his command, had revolted to Octavianus; which unexpected disappointment threw him into such despair, that he was with much ado prevented by his friends from putting an end to his unhappy life. The only resolution therefore he could now take was to follow Cleopatra to Alexandria, where she was arrived a little before <sup>b</sup>. That crafty princess, fearing she might not be received by her subjects, were her misfortunes known, entered the harbour with crowns on the prows of her ships, as if she had obtained some signal victory. By this means being admitted into her metropolis, she put all those to death, who were any ways averse to her, to prevent the tumults which she feared they might raise, when the true state of her affairs should be known<sup>c</sup>. Antony, on his arrival in Egypt, found her engaged in a very extraordinary undertaking. To avoid falling into the hands of Octavianus, who, she foresaw, would follow her into Egypt, she undertook the carrying of her ships in the Mediterranean into the Red-Sea, over the isthmus of seventy miles which lay between them. These ships he designed to join to those she then had in the Red-Sea, and, putting all her treasures on board of them, to go in quest of some other place to settle in, out of the enemy's reach. But the Arabians, who inhabited that coast, having, at the instigation of Q. Didius, who had seized on Syria for Octavianus, burnt all the ships that were carried over, and the others she had there before, she was forced to drop this enterprize<sup>d</sup>. Antony, on his arrival at Alexandria, declined seeing Cleopatra, and shut himself up in a house, which he caused to be built on the shore, sequestering himself from the company and conversation of all men. For, being forsaken by those he most confided in, he pretended to act the part of Timon the misanthropist, or manhater; and therefore called this house his Timonium; there spending his time in solitude, and detesting all men for the sake of those who had abandoned him, as if his misfortunes had been owing to them, and not to his own ill conduct and folly<sup>e</sup>. But he did not long relish this way of living; his passion for Cleopatra soon revived, and drew him from his retirement to the queen's palace; where he spent the remaining part of his life in his usual excesses of luxury, voluptuousness, and folly.

IN the mean time, Octavianus, having settled the affairs of Greece and Asia Minor, repaired to Samos; and there took up his winter-quarters. Early in the spring from Samos he passed over to Rhodes; where Herod king of Judea came to offer him his assistance against Antony and Cleopatra. That prince had been greatly attached to the interest of Antony, had assisted him to the utmost of his power, and continued faithful to him, till his case was grown absolutely desperate. On his return into Egypt he had sent a special messenger to him, with the best advice the state of his affairs was then capable of; this was, to kill Cleopatra, seize her kingdom; and with her treasures raise a new army for the carrying on of the war. In case he followed his advice, he promised to stand by him to the utmost, and venture both his life and kingdom in his cause. But when he found that Antony would not hearken to his counsels, nor by any means be prevailed upon to abandon Cleopatra, he thought it high time to take care of himself, and endeavour to make up matters with Octavianus on the best terms he could<sup>f</sup>. From Rhodes Octavianus passed through Asia Minor into Syria, with a design to invade Egypt on that side, while Cornelius Gallus, the famous poet, whom he had appointed to succeed Scarpus in Libya and Cyrene, entered it on the other. In the mean time Antony and Cleopatra tried, but without success, to appease Octavianus. They sent three different embassies to him, and even went so far as to offer themselves ready to resign all, and live a private life in Athens, or any other place which he should appoint; the only thing they desired was, that the kingdom of Egypt might be given to Cleopatra's children. Though Cleopatra joined her ambassadors with Antony's, yet she gave them instructions to treat separately for herself, and sent privately by them to Octavianus a sceptre, a crown, and chair of gold, resigning, as it were, all her power and authority to him. Octavianus accepted Cleopatra's presents, and in public returned her ambassadors the following answer, viz. that if the queen of Egypt would lay down her arms, and resign her kingdom, he should then consider, whether she ought to be treated with rigour or mercy, but privately he promised her impunity, and even her kingdom, in case she would put Antony to death<sup>g</sup>. As for Antony's ambassadors, he would not so much as see them, though they delivered up to him, as a present from their master, Q. Turullius, a senator, one of Cæsar's murderers, and Antony's intimate friends. On the third embassy Antony sent his own son with a great sum of money; which Octavianus took, but sent him back his son without any answer, though Antony had, among other things, offered to kill himself, provided Octavianus would engage his word, that the kingdom of Egypt should be given to Cleopatra's children<sup>h</sup>. As Octavianus was desirous of having Cleopatra's person and treasures in his power, the former for the adorning of his triumph, and the latter for the discharging of the debts he had contracted on account of this war, he sent her several kind messages, promising to treat her with great kindness, provided she would render herself worthy of his favour, by killing Antony, who was the author of all her misfortunes. This she could not be prevailed upon to do; but she promised to deliver both him and her kingdom into his hands. Agreeable to this promise the strong and important city of Pelusium was, by her private orders, betrayed to Octavianus, though in a condition to hold out a long siege. Antony, not apprehending any danger on that side, the place being well fortified and garisoned, was gone to lay siege to Peritonium the key of Egypt on the western side. As Cornelius Gallus, who held that place for Octavianus, had no other forces with him but those that had formerly served under Antony, he hoped that, on his appearing before the town, they would again return to their former master, and deliver up the place to him. But when he approached the wall with a design to exhort them to return to their duty, Gallus caused all the trumpets to sound, so that not one word was heard of what he said. After this Gallus made a vigorous sally, repulsed his land-forces, and, having by a stratagem hemmed in all his ships in the port, destroyed his whole fleet, not one of them having been able to escape<sup>1</sup>. Antony hearing after this defeat that Pelusium was taken, and that Octavianus was advancing towards Alexandria, hastened thither to defend the capital. On his arrival, Cleopatra, the better to conceal her treachery, caused her jewels and most valuable effects to be removed from the palace to a monument of an extraordinary height and wonderful structure, which she had formerly caused to be built near the temple of Isis. Thither likewise she conveyed a great quantity of perfumes, aromatic wood, flax, &c. giving out, that, should the town be taken, she would raise there a funeral pile, and consume herself and her treasures in the flames, to prevent their falling into the enemy's hands. This she did, that Antony might not distrust her as being of intelligence with Octavianus; but the latter, not knowing her real intentions, was greatly alarmed; and, apprehending that despair might induce her to lay violent hands on herself, and destroy her treasures, sent daily kind messages to her, giving her great hopes of a friendly and generous treatment, and in the mean time advanced with great marches towards the city<sup>2</sup>. On his arrival he encamped in the hippodromus, hoping to make himself soon master of the city, by means of the intelligence he held with Cleopatra, on which he relied more than on his troops. Antony, not mistrusting Cleopatra in the least, having made the necessary preparations for a vigorous defence, sallied out upon the enemy's horse, before they had time to refresh themselves after their march; and, having intirely defeated them, returned victorious into the city, and, among the loud acclamations of the Alexandrians, threw himself, armed as he was, at Cleopatra's feet, and kissed her hand, recommending to her one of his soldiers, who on that occasion had distinguished himself in a very eminent manner. The queen immediately sent for the soldier, and, in the presence of the whole people, presented him with an armour and helmet of pure gold; which he accepting, with great protestations of gratitude and loyalty, deserted that very night to the enemy<sup>1</sup>. After this Antony made another sally, but was repulsed with great loss, the Egyptians having, by Cleopatra's private orders, abandoned him in the heat of the engagement. Hereupon his friends, who had watched more narrowly Cleopatra's conduct, told him in plain terms, that she betrayed him, and maintained a correspondence with the enemy. This Antony was so far from believing, that he expressed great wrath against those who seemed to suspect her, telling them, that he might put a speedy end to the war, if those, who affected to be his friends, proved as faithful to him as his dear Cleopatra. Early next morning he went down to the harbour, and having drawn up his ships, he sailed out with a design to attack the enemy's fleet. But the signal was no sooner given for the engagement, than Cleopatra's admiral, followed by all the Egyptian ships in compliance with her orders, went over to Octavianus. Hereupon Antony hastened back to his land-army, which he had drawn up on some eminences within the city; but was greatly surprized, when he found that they had all to a man, both horse and foot, deserted to the enemy. This opened Antony's eyes, and made him give credit to what his friends had told him of the queen's perfidy. In this extremity not knowing whom to confide in, and having no forces to oppose the enemy, he sent to challenge Octavianus to a single combat; but he, smiling at this new proposal, answered, that if Antony was tired of his life, there were not wanting halters and daggers enow in Alexandria. The brave Romans looked upon such challenges as the effects of despair, and not of valour. Antony, seeing himself thus ridiculed by his enemy, abandoned by his friends, and, what most of all grieved him, betrayed by his beloved Cleopatra, flew full of rage and despair to the palace, with a design to kill the perfidious queen. But she, by a timely flight, escaped his fury, retiring to the above-mentioned monument, with two of her maids, and one of her eunuchs. There she shut herself up, and caused it to be given out, that she had killed herself, to avoid falling into the enemy's hands. Antony, too credulous, did not allow himself time to examine a piece of news, which he ought not to have easily credited after Cleopatra's late behaviour; but, passing from an excess of rage to the most violent transports of grief, thought of nothing but following her, by putting a speedy end to his unhappy life <sup>m</sup>.

HAVING taken this desperate resolution, he shut himself up in his apartment with a faithful slave called Eros, who had long before promised to kill him, when the desperate state of his affairs should require that mournful office at his hands. Taking therefore his armour off, he put Eros in mind of his promise, and, turning his back to him, commanded him to run him through with the sword he put into his hand. But the slave, full of affection, respect, and fidelity for his master, stabbed himself with it, and fell dead at his feet. Antony, encouraged by his example, fell upon his sword, and gave himself the wound, of which he afterwards died. But as he did not expire immediately, he begged some of his friends, who had broke into his apartment, to give him the last instance of their friendship and affection, by completing what he had begun. But they all fled out of the room, leaving him wallowing in his blood. Dercetæus, one of Antony's guards, concealing under his garment the sword, with which he had given himself the mortal wound, hastened to Octavianus, and shewing him the sword covered all over with blood, acquainted him the first with the death of his rival. Octavianus at the sight of the sword withdrew, without uttering a single word, to the innermost parts of his tent, and there, with many tears, lamented the unhappy fate of his colleague and relation. Having thus given, or pretended to give, vent to his grief, he called in his friends, and read to them the imperious and threatening letters which Antony had wrote to him. He then sent Proculeius into the city, ordering him to use his utmost endeavours to get Cleopatra alive into his power <sup>n</sup>.

IN the mean time the tumult and noise, which the news of Antony's death occasioned all over the city, alarming Cleopatra, she looked out from the top of the monument, and hearing that Antony had wounded himself, but was not yet dead, she commanded Diomedes her secretary to bring him to her into the monument. Diomedes entering his room, found him lying by the dead slave in a torrent of blood ; but he no sooner pronounced the name of Cleopatra, than he opened his dying eyes ; and being informed that she was still alive, and desired to see him, he suffered his wound to be dressed, and caused himself to be carried by the hands of his slaves to the gate of the monument, which Cleopatra would not suffer to be opened for fear of some surprize. However, she ordered her servants below to fasten him to the ropes, which hung from the top of the monument, and were made use of to pull up stones, that part not being yet finished. They obeyed her orders, and Antony being made fast to the ropes, Cleopatra, assisted by her two women, with much ado, drew him up, her servants below raising him till he was out of their reach. Never was there a more moving sight. Antony, all bathed in his blood, with death painted in his face, was dragged up in the manner we have related, turning his eyes, and extending his arms to Cleopatra, as if he conjured her to receive his last breath ; while she, bathed in tears, underwent a fatigue she had never been used to, for the poor satisfaction of taking her last farewell of him, and seeing him die in her arms. As soon as she had taken him in, she laid him on a bed ; and there, after having expressed her grief and concern in the most tender and affecting terms, she cut off his hair, according to the superstition of the pagans, who looked upon this as a relief to those who died of a violent death. Antony, seeing Cleopatra's affliction, called for some wine, and having by that means somewhat raised his drooping spirits, he endeavoured to comfort her in the best manner he could ; he told her, that he thought himself happy as he died in her arms ; that as to his defeat, he was not ashamed of it, since it was no dishonour for a Roman to be overcome by a Roman ; he advised her to consult her own interest, to save her life and kingdom, provided she could do it with honour ; and lastly, to trust none of the friends of Octavianus, except Proculeius. With these words he expired, and the same moment Proculeius arrived from Octavianus's camp. But the queen kept in the monument, refusing to surrender herself to him, unless he would promise her, in the name of Octavianus, both the kingdom of Egypt and her liberty. These were terms which Proculeius could not grant ; for Octavianus, having a great desire to carry her in triumph, had warned him not to promise her any thing, that could prevent him from treating her as a captive. However, they had a long conference, Cleopatra standing within, and Proculeius close to the gate without. In this conference she begged the kingdom of Egypt for her children, and insisted on having her liberty granted to her ; on these two conditions she offered to deliver into his hands both her person and her treasures. But Proculeius exhorting her only in general terms to confide in Octavianus, and refer all things to his generosity and good-nature, she broke off the conference and retired. Proculeius made his report to Octavianus, who immediately sent Cornelius Gallus, a man of great learning and eloquence, to confer with her, being greatly afraid lest she should be driven by despair to lay violent hands on herself, and to destroy her treasures. While Gallus amused her with fine speeches at the gate of the monument, Proculeius having caused a ladder to be brought, scaled the wall, and, entering with two servants at the same place where Antony had been taken in, hastened down to the gate, where she was conferring with Gallus. When Cleopatra saw him unexpectedly appear, she drew a dagger, which she always carried about her, with a design to stab herself. But Proculeius flying to her took her in his arms, and forced the dagger out of her hands, before she could make use of it. He afterwards searched her, and shook her robes, lest she should have any weapon or poison concealed in them ; and having exhorted her to be of good cheer, and to confide in the goodness and clemency of the conqueror, he sent one to acquaint Octavianus, that the queen of Egypt was his prisoner. Octavianus, overjoyed at this news, sent Epaphroditus one of his freedmen to guard her carefully, and prevent her from making any attempt upon her own life, injoining him strictly at the same time to treat her with all possible complaisance and respect °.

In the mean time, Octavianus leaving his camp drew near the city of Alexandria, and finding the gates open entered it, talking with Arius, a native of the place, who had been his preceptor, and leaning upon him with an air of familiarity, that his countrymen might honour him the more, in seeing him thus honoured and favoured by their conqueror. He went directly to the gymnasium, and having ascended a tribunal, which he had caused to be erected there, he first commanded the inhabitants, who had fallen prostrate on the ground before him, to rise ; and then in an elegant harangue told the multitude, that he freely pardoned them in regard of their god Serapis, on account of the beauty and greatness of their city, and for the sake of Arius their fellow-citizen, for whom he had a great value and esteem<sup>P</sup>.

Octavianus, being now in possession of Alexandria, sent Proculeius to comfort the queen, and ask her in his name, whether she had any request to make him? Cleopatra received him with great kindness, and, after returning many thanks to Octavianus, said, that she had but one favour to beg of him, which was, that he would give her leave to bury Antony. This he willingly granted, allowing her to perform the funeral obsequies with all possible splendor, and to spend on that occasion what sums she pleased. And indeed she spared no cost to render the interment magnificent, according to the Egyptian custom; she caused his body to be embalmed with the best perfumes of the east, and placed it in the burying-place of the kings of Egypt<sup>Q</sup>. As this mournful ceremony renewed her grief, she was seized with a fever, which she with great joy laid hold of as a pretence to abstain from all food, and by that means put an end to her life. This her design she imparted to Olympus her physician, who approved of it, and promised to bring her soon into a consumption. But Octavianus, being informed of her indisposition, sent physicians to her, whom he could confide in, and, by uttering threats against her children, prevailed upon her to follow their prescriptions. When she was pretty well recovered, Octavianus sent Proculeius to acquaint her, that he should be glad to wait upon her, provided she gave him leave; for he treated her with the utmost complaisance, the better to conceal his design, which was to adorn his triumph with so noble and famous a captive. Though she was greatly disfigured by her illness and grief, yet she did not despair of inspiring the young conqueror with sentiments of tenderness and love, as she had formerly done Cæsar and Antony. She was therefore overjoyed to hear, that he intended to pay her a visit, and as soon as he entered her room, she threw herself at his feet, and afterwards, in laying before him the state of her affairs, exerted all her charms, in hopes of conquering her conqueror. But whether her charms had no longer the same power, or that ambition was Octavianus's ruling passion, he was not affected either with her person or conversation; the whole time she spoke he kept his eyes fixed on the ground; and when she had done speaking, he returned her the following Laconic answer:

Woman, be of good cheer ; you shall have no harm done you <sup>r</sup>. She was far from being insensible of this coldness and indifference, which she looked upon as no good omen ; but, however, dissembling her concern, she thanked him for the honour he had done her, and told him, that in token of her gratitude she designed to deliver up to him all the treasures of the kings of Egypt. Accordingly she put an inventory into his hands of all her moveables, jewels, and revenues. Seleucus, one of her treasurers then present, accused her to Octavianus, of having concealed part of her most valuable effects ; which she looking upon as an affront not to be bore, flew at him in a violent passion, and, taking hold of him by the hair, gave him several blows in the face ; then turning to Octavianus, who could not help smiling, Is it not very hard, said she, since you have been so good as to visit me in my present condition, that one of my own servants should thus insult me in your presence ? I have, 'tis true, reserved some jewels, not to adorn my own person, but to make a present of them to your sister Octavia and your wife Livia, that by their intercession you may treat an unfortunate princess with more favour and kindness. Octavianus was overjoyed to hear her talk in this manner, not doubting but she had laid aside all thoughts of destroying herself. He gave her leave to dispose of the jewels she had reserved, to whom and in what manner she pleased ; and having assured her, that she should be treated with more generosity and kindness than she expected, he withdrew, imagining he had deceived her, whereas he was deceived himself <sup>c</sup>. For Cleopatra, not doubting but Octavianus intended to make her serve as an ornament to his triumph, was firmly determined to avoid that shame by a voluntary death, and had no other thoughts than how to put her design in execution. She was narrowly watched by Epaphroditus, who never suffered her to go out of his sight. In hopes therefore of finding some opportunity to deceive him, she sent one of her domestics to Octavianus, desiring his permission to pay her last duty at the tomb of Antony, and take her leave of him. Octavianus willingly complying with her request, she bathed the tomb with her tears, covered it with flowers, and with many sighs and lamentations performed such ceremonies as were practised among the Egyptians on like occasions. But Epaphroditus keeping close to her the whole time, under colour of attending her, she returned to her apartment, without having had an opportunity of attempting any thing on her own life. On her return she was accosted by a messenger from Cornelius Dolabella, who told her, that her time was short, Octavianus, who was to march by land through Syria, having given orders, that she and her children should, within three days, be put on board a vessel which was ready in the harbour, and be conveyed by sea to Rome. Cornelius Dolabella was one of Octavianus's intimate friends ; but as he was in love with Cleopatra, he had promised to give her timely notice of all his designs with relation to her person. Upon this message Cleopatra, the better to amuse Epaphroditus, commanded a noble entertainment to be prepared, and having invited to it some of her friends, she shewed a more than usual chearfulness during the feast. In the height of the mirth she rose from table, and having wrote a letter to Octavianus, she gave it sealed up to Epaphroditus, begging he would deliver it himself into his own hands, since it contained matters of the utmost consequence. This was only a pretence to send Epaphroditus, who kept a watchful eye over her, out of the way. When he was gone, she withdrew to her room attended by Nairas and Charmion, two of her women ; and having there dressed herself in her royal robes, she lay down on her bed, and asked for a basket of figs, which one of her faithful servants had brought her in the disguise of a peasant. Among the figs was concealed an asp, a kind of serpent peculiar to Egypt and Libya, and of a very venomous nature ; for those who were bit by it fell immediately into a kind of lethargy, and died without any pain or uneasiness. This venomous insect Cleopatra applied to her left arm, and that very instant falling, as it were, asleep, expired in the arms of her two maids <sup>u</sup>. Other writers tell us, that Cleopatra having made a deep wound in her arm with her teeth, poured the poison of the asp, which she had prepared beforehand, into it, and gently expired <sup>w</sup>. In the mean time, Octavianus having received from Epaphroditus and read Cleopatra's letter, found from the contents of it that she designed to lay violent hands on herself, since the whole subject of it was to beg, that he would suffer her to be buried in the same tomb with Antony. He therefore immediately dispatched some of his friends to see what had happened, and to prevent her, if still alive, from attempting any thing on her own life.

These found the guards standing at the gate, and mistrusting nothing; but when they entered her apartment, they to their great surprize saw her lying dead, on a golden bed, in her royal robes, one of her maids likewise dead at her feet, and the other ready to expire. They immediately acquainted Octavianus with what had happened, who hastened to the queen's apartment, saw her body, and, not believing she was dead, tried all possible means to recover her. But finding that all his endeavours were to no purpose, though he was very much grieved to see himself thus deprived of the chief glory and ornament of his triumph, yet he granted her last petition, and commanded her body to be buried with all possible pomp, and laid in the same tomb with Antony *. Thus died Cleopatra, after she had reigned from the death of her father twenty two years, and lived thirty nine. She was a woman of extraordinary parts, for she is said to have been thoroughly skilled in Greek and Latin, and besides to have spoke with great ease and readiness many other languages, conversing with the Ethiopians, Troglodites, Jews, Arabians, Syrians, Medes, and Persians without an interpreter, and always giving to such of those nations as had occasion to address her an answer in their own language. She retained in the midst of her pleasures a taste for polite learning, and erected in the place where the famous library stood a new one, no-ways inferior to the former, enriching it with the two hundred thousand volumes of the library of Pergamus, which Antony had presented her with †. In her ended the family of Ptolemy Lagus the founder of the Egyptian monarchy, after it had ruled over Egypt from the death of Alexander two hundred and ninety four years, or, as others will have it, two hundred and ninety three and three months. For from this time Egypt was reduced to a Roman province, and governed by a prætor sent thither from Rome. The first on whom Octavianus conferred that dignity, was Cornelius Gallus, the famous poet, who is the subject of Virgil's tenth eclogue. Cæsarion, Cleopatra's son by Julius Cæsar, the conqueror caused to be put to death, because he pretended to be the lawful heir, which the adopted son could not bear. Her children by Antony he treated with great kindness, as he did all her friends and servants. All the statues of Antony he caused to be thrown down and broke to pieces, but left those of Cleopatra standing, having been prevailed upon by one Archibilius, who had been long in her service and made him a present of a thousand talents, to spare them. Octavianus, having thus reduced Egypt, returned to Rome, and in his triumph carried her image, since he could not her person, with an asp fixed to her arm<sup>2</sup>. From this conquest of Egypt began the æra of the Actiac victory, by which the Egyptians afterwards computed their time; the Philippic æra, which commenced from the death of Alexander, and the beginning of the reign of Philippus Aridæus his successor, having been in use among them till the reduction of their country by Octavianus. Though this æra had its name from the Actiac victory, yet it did not begin till near a full year after it, that is, till Egypt was entirely reduced; for the Actiac victory was gained on the second of September, and the æra of that victory commenced on the twenty ninth of the ensuing August, which was then the first day of the Egyptian month. As this month was the first of their year, from whence they began all their calculations, they thought it the most proper time to begin such alterations in their year and æra, as the Romans on the conquest of their country took upon them to make in both. This æra ought, properly speaking, to have been called the æra of the Egyptian conquest, since it had its beginning from that conquest. But the Egyptians, to avoid the shame of thus owning themselves conquered, chose rather to call it the æra of the Actiac victory, it being in their power, since this æra was used only in Egypt, to call it by what name they pleased<sup>3</sup>.

Name.

WHENCE the tract we commonly call Armenia borrowed its name is not determined. The Greeks will have it so called from one Armenus, who, after attending Jason in the Argonautic expedition, settled in this country. Others, transforming Armenia into Aramia, derive its name from Aram the son of Shem, or from one of the kings of Armenia bearing that name <sup>a</sup>. Bochart <sup>b</sup> takes Armenia to be a contraction or compound of Aar, signifying in Hebrew a mountain, and Mini the name of a province in this country mentioned by Jeremy <sup>c</sup>, and placed by that prophet between Ararat and Abchenaz. This opinion seems to be supported by the Chaldee interpreters, who, both on this and a like passage in Amos <sup>d</sup>, instead of Mini, read Armenia; so that Armenia signifies the mountain or mountainous part of Mini, or Mynias, as Nicolas of Damascus calls it. The name of Mini, Menni, and Mynias, or Mylias, was at first peculiar to one province; but in process of time became common to the whole country. As to the word Mini or Menni, it is thought to be originally derived from an Hebrew word, signifying metal, seeing Armenia abounded with mines, as is plain from Procopius <sup>e</sup>.

Division.

Armenia was antiently divided into the Greater and Lesser, or Armenia Major and Minor. Armenia Major, which we shall treat of in the first place, was, according to Strabo <sup>f</sup>, bounded on the south by mount Taurus, separating it from Mesopotamia; on the east by both Medias, viz. the Great Media, and that which was known under the name of Atropatia; on the north by Iberia and Albania, or rather that part of the Caucasus which surrounds them both ; on the west by Armenia Minor, or the mountain Paryadres, by some Pontic nations, and the Euphrates. Ptolemy divides all Armenia into three districts, as we may call them ; the first comprehending that part which lies between the Cyrus and the Araxes ; the second those provinces which extend westward to the bending of the Euphrates ; and the third all the country lying between the springs of the Tigris, and that part of the Euphrates, which separates Commagene from Armenia Major. Ptolemy enumerates in his first division the following provinces ; Catarzene towards the Moschick mountains, probably the same as Strabo's Chorzene ; Offarene and Motene, both on the banks of the Cyrus ; Colthene on the banks of the Araxes ; Soducene, Sibacene, and Sacapene ; these two last provinces extend to the mountain Paryadres. The second division comprehends the following provinces ; Basilissene, Bolbene, Arseta, Acilissene, Austanitis, and Sophene. In the third division Ptolemy places Azetene, Thospitis, Corinea, Bagrauandene, Gordene, called also Gorduene, Gordycene, and Corduene, from the Gordyæan mountains. To these we may add Gorgodylene, which Strabo<sup>g</sup> mentions as lying under the mountain Niphates ; Cholobetena mentioned by Stephanus and Bochart<sup>h</sup>, who conjectures it to have been so called from Chul, the son of Aram, and Shem's grandson ; Taurantium, mentioned by Tacitus<sup>i</sup> and other antient writers, &c.

Ptolemy enumerates a great many cities in Armenia, which Cities. we find mentioned by no other geographer or historian, and therefore shall take no notice of them here, but describe such only as we can give some tolerable account of. Among these the following are the most considerable ; Artaxata, the metropolis of all Armenia, and from its foundation the residence of the Armenian kings. This city, as Strabo informs us<sup>k</sup>, was built upon a plan which Hannibal gave to king Artaxas or Artaxias, who made it the capital of Armenia. It was situated upon an elbow of the river Araxes, which forms a kind of peninsula, and surrounded the town like a wall, except on the side of the isthmus ; but the isthmus was secured by a rampart and a broad ditch. This is the account Strabo gives us of that strong town. But Cornelius Nepos, in his life of Hannibal, does not mention his journey into Armenia ; he only says, that after the defeat of Antiochus he withdrew first to Crete, and from thence to Bithynia, where he died.

Plutarch, however <sup>1</sup>, seems to confirm what Strabo advances, saying, that Hannibal, after the overthrow of Antiochus by Scipio Asiaticus, fled into Armenia, where he assisted king Artaxas with his advice, and persuaded him to build the city of Artaxata in a very advantageous situation. Lucullus, after having defeated the Armenians, under the command of their king Tigranes, in two battles, would not venture, notwithstanding the enemies were not able to keep the field, to lay siege to Artaxata, which he looked upon as impregnable. But Pompey, who succeeded him in the command of the army, pressed Tigranes so hard, that he was obliged to deliver up his capital without striking a blow. Pompey spared both the city and the inhabitants; but in Nero's reign, Corbulo, the commander in chief of the Roman forces in the east, having forced Tiridates to yield up Artaxata, levelled it with the ground. Tiridates, having thus lost his metropolis, and with it his kingdom, went to Rome to throw himself at Nero's feet; who not only restored him the diadem, but also gave him leave to take workmen with him to assist him in rebuilding Artaxata, which by way of acknowledgment he called Neronia, from the name of his benefactor. The ruins of this city, according to the tradition of the Armenians, are still to be seen at a place called Ardachat. The inhabitants of this place, says a late traveller <sup>m</sup>, call the town Ardachat, from the name of Artaxias, whom in the east they call Ardechier. There are here some remains of a stately palace, which the Armenians take to be the palace of Tiridates, who reigned in the time of Constantine the Great; one front of this building is but half ruined, a great many pillars of black marble, and of an extraordinary size, are still standing, and many other fine antiquities, which the inhabitants call Taët-Tardat, that is, the throne of Tiridates. Tavernier also * mentions the ruins of Artaxata, between Erivan and mount Ararat, but does not specify them. The ancient geographers mention another city bearing the same name, and likewise situated on the Araxes, but in the northern part of Media, known among the ancients by the name of Atropatia. This some moderns have confounded with the metropolis of Armenia.

THE other cities of note in ancient times were, Sebastia, seated on the banks of the Euphrates, not far from the mountain Taurus, so called from Augustus, whom the Greeks styled Sebastos. Armosata, or Arsamosata, once a very considerable city, and of the greatest note after Artaxata. It was situated between the Tigris and the Euphrates, which has made some place it in Mesopotamia <sup>a</sup>, though Pliny, Polybins, and Tacitus call it in express words a city of Armenia. Tigranocerta built by Tigranes in the time of the Mithridatic war, and so named from its founder, the word Certa in the Parthian, Armenian, and Syriac languages, signifying a city. It was seated in the southern part of Armenia, on the top of a steep hill, between the springs of the Tigris and the mountain Taurus. This city Tigranes peopled with the inhabitants of divers nations which he had conquered, and enriched, we may say, with the wealth of all Armenia; for there was not one Armenian from the highest to the lowest that did not contribute towards the embellishing of it. Lucullus took it without great resistance, the inhabitants, as being of different nations, not agreeing among themselves; and found in it, besides an immense quantity of other valuable things, no less than eight thousand talents in ready money. Artagera, where the emperor Caius received the wound of which he died <sup>o</sup>. Carchasiocerta called by Strabo <sup>p</sup> the metropolis of Sophene, which province is washed by the Euphrates, but placed by Pliny <sup>q</sup> near the Tigris. Colonia the strongest place of all Armenia, when possessed by the Romans. (A) 'Tis generally believed, that Erzeron is the ancient city of Theodosiopolis, which a late judicious traveller (1) does not think improbable, provided we suppose, that the inhabitants of Artze retired to Theodosiopolis after the demolition of their own city, which supposition is not ill-grounded. For Cedrenus informs us, that in the reign of Constantine Monomachus, who died about the middle of the eleventh century, Artze was a great and wealthy borough, inhabited by the merchants of different nations, who, confiding in their numbers and strength, would not retire with their effects to Theodosiopolis, during the wars between that emperor and the Mohammedans. By these the place was besieged, and the inhabitants made such a vigorous defence, that the general of the Mohammedans apprehending the town might be relieved, caused it to be set on fire on all sides, sacrificing the booty to his reputation. Cedrenus tells us, that an hundred and forty thousand souls perished

Rivers.

As to the rivers of this country, Strabo enumerates six of great note among the antients, viz. the Lycus, and Phasis falling into the Pontus; the Cyrus and Araxes discharging themselves into the Caspian sea; and the Tigris and Euphrates, which disembogue themselves into the Persian gulf. The Lycus, the Phasis, and the Cyrus, though they rise in Armenia, yet are more properly reckoned by most of the antient geographers rivers of Pontus, Colchis, and Albania, since the two former wash but the skirts of Armenia, and the latter springs from the hills of Iberia, which separate that country from Armenia, whence it is by some accounted a river of Iberia, but by the generality of geographers after Ptolemy of Albania; where, being increased with several others, it bein the siege by fire or sword. The husbands, says he, leaped into the flames with their wives and children in their arms. The conqueror found abundance of gold arms, which the fire could not consume. As the town was reduced to ashes, it is not unlikely, that the few inhabitants, who out-lived the destruction of their country, retired with the foreign merchants to Theodosiopolis, which, according to Cedrenus, was situated close by it. The Turks, thinking perhaps Theodosiopolis too long and troublesome a name, gave it that of Artzerum; that is, Artze of the Greeks or Christians; from Artzerom comes Erzeron. We must not confound this city of Theodosiopolis with another of the same name on the river Abborras in Mesopotamia, which the emperor Anastasius, as Procopius informs us, fortified with strong walls. 'Tis commonly believed, that Orthogul, father of the famous Othoman, the first emperor of the Turks, took Erzeron; but it is certain, that the Armenians had a king of their own, even in the reign of Selim the first. Some writers, misled by the similitude of names, take Erzeron to be the city of Aziris placed by Ptolemy in Armenia Minor.

(B) Cars is the last town ... Turky towards the frontiers of Persia. It is built on a rising ground, exposed to the south-south-east. It is defended by a castle built on a steep rock, and has behind it a deep valley watered by a river, which not far from thence disembogues itself into the Arpagi, without ever coming near the city of Erzeron, contrary to the description Sanfon has given us of it. These two rivers joined together are known by the name of Arpagi, and serve as a frontier to the two empires. Sanfon places Cars at the conflux of the two imaginary branches of the Euphrates, which according to him, form a considerable river that waters Erzeron. The Arpagi falls into Araxes, or Aras, as the Turks and Persians call it.

comes a very considerable stream. The Araxes, or, as the Turks call it, the Aras, springs from the same mountain as the Euphrates. This mountain Strabo<sup>r</sup> calls Abus, and places it between the mountain Niphates and Nibarus; Domitius Corbulo, who had been upon the spot, gives it the name of Aba; Nutianus, who had also visited the country, calls it Capotes; and Eustathius with Dionysius Periegetes style it Achos. Springing from this mountain, which is part of mount Taurus, it continues its course eastward to the city of Atropatene; from thence bending its course north-westward, it flows close by Azara and Artaxata, and falls at length into the Caspian sea (C). It is too rapid to bear a bridge, and carried away those which the masters of the world built over it. On the banks of this river have appeared the most famous warriors of antiquity, Xerxes, Alexander, Lucullus, Pompey, Mithridates, &c. The modern geographers, who make this river flow from mount Ararat, must certainly mistake the river which runs near Ascourlon for the Araxes. The Euphrates springs from the same hill as the Araxes, and immediately divides itself into two branches, which the antient historians call the sources of the Euphrates. The first flows from east to south, and running between the mountains, at the foot of which the town of Erzeron is situated, continues its course southward to a little borough called Mommacotum. The other stream flows northward to the town of Elijah, and thence bending westward along the road to Tocat, is obliged by the disposition of the ground to turn southward at Mommacotum, where it joins the other branch, which is far more considerable. The town of Erzeron is not seated on the banks of the Euphrates, as the modern geographers place it, but in a peninsula formed by the two branches of the Euphrates, the first of which runs a day's journey distance from Erzeron, and the other a day and a half, or rather two days jour-

(C) Strabo and many others (2) say, that the Araxes falls into the Caspian sea near the mouth of the Cyrus; but Pliny (3), Plutarch (4), and Appianus (5), make it discharge itself into the Cyrus. Ptolemy (6) divides the Araxes into two branches, and describes one joining the Cyrus, the other he makes fall into the Caspian sea. All our modern maps make the Araxes disemboque itself into the Cyrus.

ney. But we have already described the whole course of this river † (D). The Tigris according to Strabo †, rises on the south side of mount Taurus; according to Pliny †, in a great plain of Armenia, which he calls Elegosine, runs through the lake Arcthusa, and meeting with mount Taurus buries itself under-ground, and appears again on the other side of that mountain. This breaking out of the river Strabo evidently mistook for its first rise, for in all the rest he agrees with Pliny and Ptolemy. This river runs with an incredible rapidity, whence it had the name of Tigris, which in the language of the Medes signifies an arrow. It continues its course, after it has passed under the huge bulk of mount Taurus, washing the eastern skirts of Mesopotamia, which it divides from Assyria, till, mixing with its fellow-traveller the Euphrates at Apamea in Chaldea, it falls at length into the Persian gulf. Many writers take these four rivers, viz. the Euphrates, the Tigris, the Phasis, and the Araxes to be the four rivers mentioned by Moses, as coming out of the terrestrial paradise. They suppose the Phasis to be the Pison, and the Araxes or Aras the Gihon. But of this subject, and the various suppositions and opinions relating thereunto, we have treated elsewhere at large † (E). Besides these rivers there were several † others

(D) Procopius seems to have known nothing of the two branches of the Euphrates. For he calls one of the branches the Tigris, and the other the Euphrates. There is, says he, a mountain in Armenia five miles and a half from Theodosiopolis, whence issue two great rivers; that which flows to the right is called the Euphrates, the other the Tigris; whereas Strabo tells us in express words, that the springs of these two rivers are two hundred and fifty miles distant from each other. Pompey, as we are informed by Florus, was the first that built a bridge over this river, which he did in pursuing Mithridates. This bridge in all likelihood was built near the elbow, which this river makes, after its two branches are joined at Mommacotum. For our modern travellers seem to agree in this, that the battle between Pompey and Mithridates was fought in the plain of Erzeron, and Mithridates is said to have passed by the sources of the Euphrates on his retreat into Colchis, a few years before Lucullus had sacrificed a bull to this river in order to obtain a favourable passage.

(E) The commentators on the book of Genesis, even those who are most confined to the literal sense, do not think it necessary, in order to fix the situation of Eden, to find a river, which divides

others of less note, namely, the Musis mentioned by Pliny <sup>a</sup>, as discharging itself into the Araxes; Nicephorius running according to Tacitus <sup>b</sup>, between Tigranocerta and Artaxata, and falling into the Euphrates; Niphates mentioned by Lucan <sup>c</sup>, and Silius Italicus <sup>d</sup>; and springing from a mountain of the same name.

The most considerable mountains of this country are the Moschick mountains, separating the western parts of Armenia from Colchis; some writers will have them so called from Mesech or Mosoch the son of Japhet. Paryadræ extending from the Moschick mountains to the borders of Armenia Minor and Pontus. Masius bounding the province of Sophene to the south, as Antitaurus does to the north. Niphates well known to the poets, and famous for the springs of the Tigris. Abus from which issues the Euphrates. The Gordyæan mountains, which separate, according to Strabo <sup>b</sup>, the province of Sophene and the rest of Armenia from Mesopotamia. Of the mountains of Ararat, whereon the ark rested, we have treated elsewhere <sup>c</sup>.

THIS country is very hilly and mountainous, but the hills are here and there interspersed with fruitful and most beautiful dales and valleys. All sorts of grain are but very indifferent in Armenia; in most places it yields but four-fold. If they had not the conveniency of watering their lands, they would be almost barren. What the country produces is almost intirely owing to the painful labour of the inhabitants, who either actually water it by hand, or dig trenches and other conveniencies of that kind, for the fecundation of their fields. The wine of this country is cried down by the generality of our modern travellers. One of these <sup>d</sup> itself into four branches, considering the great alterations that may have been occasioned by the flood; but think it enough to shew the heads of the rivers mentioned by Moses, namely, the Euphrates, the Tigris, the Pison and Gibon. And thus, taking the Phasis for Pison, and the Araxes for Gibon, they come to place the terrestrial paradise in the beautiful vales of Georgia, and namely in the country of the Three Churches about sixty miles distant from the springs of the Euphrates and Araxes, and about as many from those of the Phasis. The extent of Eden must at least have reached to the springs of these rivers, and thus comprehended all Media and part of Armenia and Iberia.

has started an objection which tends to overthrow the tradition of the ark's resting on one of the mountains of Armenia: for the olive, says he, is not found thereabouts, nor in any part of Asia beyond Aleppo, except one single place near Casbin in Persia. However, it seems to have been otherwise antiently, for we are told by Strabo<sup>e</sup>, that the olive grew in Gogarene, a province of Armenia. The cold is so extraordinary here, that all kinds of fruit are more backward than in most of the northern countries. The hills are covered with snow the whole year round, and it sometimes falls even in the month of June. Lucullus, when appointed to command the Roman army in Armenia, was greatly surprized to find the whole country covered with snow at the autumnal equinox, to see most of the rivers frozen up, and vast numbers of the horses of his army dying every day by reason of the coldness of the waters. Alexander Severus was no better pleased with this country, having lost on his march through it great part of his army, the cold being then so excessive, that many of the soldiers, as Zonaras informs us, were frozen under their tents, and others lost their hands and feet, being obliged to encamp in the snow. A modern traveller tells us<sup>f</sup>, that even in the middle of July he often found ice about the springs before the rising of the sun, notwithstanding it was exceeding hot in the day-time; this cold keeps every thing so back, that the corn, as the same traveller observed, was not at that time of the year a foot high, and the other fruits of the earth scarce so forward as they are about Paris at the end of April. Their method of plowing the land is somewhat surprizing, for they usually put to one plow ten or twelve yoke of oxen, each yoke having a driver, and this to make deeper furrows, experience having taught them, that it was necessary to go very deep, either to mix the upper soil, which is too dry, with that which lies beneath and is less so, or to preserve the seed from the hard frosts; for were it not on some such consideration, they would not be at such an expence. Notwithstanding all this, we are told, that the corn would be quite burnt up were not the fields frequently watered either by hand, or by trenches dug for that purpose. Perhaps great plenty of water is necessary to dissolve the salt and nitre, wherewithal the soil in most parts of Armenia is impregnated, and which would burn up the roots, if the clods were not well moistened with a proportionable quantity of liquid.

As to the origin of the antient Armenians, Herodotus, Antiquity. and after him Stephanus, derives them from the Phrygians by reason of several Phrygian words that were crept into the antient language of the Armenians; but this may be ascribed to the communication they had, as merchants, with the Phrygians, as they likewise had with other neighbouring nations. And we are moreover told, that a colony of the Ascanians, who were Phrygians, settled in Armenia, which the prophet Jeremy seems to insinuate in joining Ararat (that is, Armenia, as it is agreed on all hands) with Aschenaz, who is generally believed to have been the founder of the Phrygian nation, and therefore is taken for the Phrygians, seeing the name of the founder is commonly used in scripture for the nation he founded. Other writers suppose Hull or Chul the son of Aram, and Mesech the son of Japhet, to have been the progenitors of the antient Armenians; which opinion has no better foundation than the small similitude we find between Mesech and Moschick, between Chul and Cholna the name of a town in Armenia. Berosus tells us, that the ark rested in Armenia, and that Noah going from thence left his mother, his wife, and several of his descendants to people the country, supposing thereby Noah to have remained many years after the flood in Armenia<sup>1</sup>. Strabo takes them to be originally Syrians, or rather considers the Syrians and Armenians as two tribes of one and the same nation. This opinion Bochart<sup>k</sup> looks upon as the most probable, finding a great agreement between these two nations both in manners and language. In process of time many foreigners settled among them, namely Phrygians, Greeks, and Persians, as Strabo<sup>l</sup> and Ptolemy<sup>m</sup> witness.

Armenia was advanced very early to the honour of a kingdom Berosus makes one by name Scytha the first king Government. thereof, and Barzanes his successor, which Barzanes, he informs us, was conquered and driven out by Ninus; wherein he is greatly mistaken; for besides that the word Scytha was never heard of till many ages after, as we shall shew in its proper place, Barzanes was not conquered by Ninus, as Diodorus Siculus informs us, but, having made a peace and alliance with him, joined his forces against the Bactrians. Some writers by Scytha understand Hul, and will have him succeeded by Barzanes: After the death of Barzanes, they tell us, that Armenia was divided into several petty kingdoms, which is vouched also by Pliny <sup>n</sup>. Plutarch mentions one Araxes king of Armenia <sup>o</sup>, who in a war with the Persians being assured by an oracle that he should return home loaded with spoils, provided he sacrificed his two daughters, caused the two daughters of one Miesalcus, a nobleman of his court, to be sacrificed in their stead, flattering himself that he had thereby complied with the oracle. But Miesalcus did not fail to revenge the death of his daughters by that of the king's daughters, and pursued the prince himself so close, that he was drowned in endeavouring to save himself by swimming over the river then called Helmus, but ever after by the king's name Araxes. The Armenians were in process of time subdued by the Medes, to whom they were made, as we read in Xenophon, tributaries by Astyages. However, they continued to be ruled by kings of their own country; for Tigranes and Sabaris, in whom we are told the royal family of the Armenian kings was extinguished, were the sons of that king whom Cyrus afterwards subdued. We find no mention of kings, but only of prefects appointed by the kings of Persia, during the whole time they continued subject to that empire; whence we may conclude, that after the death of Tigranes and Sabaris, Armenia became a province of Persia. Alexander the Great, having possessed himself of Armenia, made Mithrines governor of both Armenias; Mithrines was succeeded by Phrataphernes, and he by Orons, both appointed by Perdiccas. After the death of Orons the Armenians, if we believe Diodorus, shook off the Macedonian yoke, and set up kings of their own; one of these, according to him, was Ardoates, who with a powerful army assisted Ariarathes III. king of Cappadocia; the same author mentions another king of Armenia contemporary with Nicomedes I. king of Bithynia. These two princes may, for aught we know, have seized on the crown of Armenia; but we are very sure, that the country was again brought under subjection by the Macedonians, there being nothing more certain, than that Armenia was held by Antigonus, and after him by Seleucus and his posterity to the time of Antiochus the Great; that is, to the sixth generation. During the minority of Antiochus, Zadriades and Artaxias, governors of Armenia, joining their forces together, seized on the country they had been set over, and adding some of the neighbouring provinces to it, while Antiochus's troops were employed elsewhere, erected not one, but two kingdoms, viz. that of

Armenia Major, which Artaxias kept for himself ; the other of Armenia Minor, which fell to Zadriades. Of these two kingdoms only our intent is to write here, seeing whatever is said of the more antient kings of Armenia is altogether uncertain, and over-cast with such a mist, that it is impossible to give any tolerable account of them. The Armenians tell us of Haikh, Amasia, and a great many others, which as we find them mentioned by no authors of any credit, we hardly think it worth our while to take any notice of. What the primitive government of Armenia may have been we know not ; but under the latter kings it was absolute and arbitrary, their princes being, as appears from history, quite uncontrolled by the subject.

WE have no system of their laws, and scarce wherewithal Laws and to form any particular idea of them ; but we are not so much religion. at a loss for what concerns their religion ; for Strabo tells us, that the Armenians, Medes, and Persians worshipped the same deities, and of the religion of the antient Persians we have already given a very particular and distinct account. However, the chief deity of the Armenians seems to have been the goddess Tanais, or, as some stile her, Anaitis. To her several temples were erected all over Armenia, but more especially in the province of Acilesina, where she was worshipped in a particular manner. Here she had a most rich and magnificent temple, with a statue of solid gold and inestimable workmanship. This temple was plundered by the Roman soldiers in Mark Antony's wars with the Persians ; on which occasion it was reported, and universally believed, that the first, who laid sacrilegious hands on the treasure and sacred utensils, was struck blind by the deity of the place, and so terrified, that he died soon after. But many years after Augustus being entertained at Bononia by an old commander, who had served in the Persian war, and inquiring about the truth of this report, the officer frankly owned, that he was the man, and added, that the only evil that happened to him on that occasion, was a plentiful estate, which was altogether owing to that sacrilege. In honour of this goddess, and in her temple, the Armenians used to prostitute their daughters, it being a custom among the young women to consecrate their virginity to Tanais, that is, to her priests. Baris was another deity peculiar to the Armenians, and had a stately temple erected to him, as Strabo informs us ; but after what manner he was worshipped, we find no-where mentioned. Juv. Juv. charges them with foretelling future events, by examining the entrails of pigeons, of dogs, and sometimes of children. Others tell us, that they used human sacrifices, which seems to be in some degree confirmed by what we have related above out of Plutarch.

*Their learning

WE can say nothing particular of their learning and arts, but what we have from writers of no great credit. Berosus<sup>9</sup> tells us, that Noah instructed here his posterity in all manner of human and divine sciences, and committed to writing many natural secrets, which the priests alone were allowed to learn, no body else being suffered to see those writings. He adds, that he left among the Armenians books of religious ceremonies, that he taught them astronomy, and the distinction of years and months, and that he was on this account stiled by them Olybama and Arfa, that is, heaven and sun; that they dedicated many cities to him, and even worshipped him under the name and title of Jupiter Sagus, accounting him the soul of the heavenly bodies. The Armenians tell us, that Noah taught them husbandry and the planting of vines, and shew to this day some vines which they pretend to be of Noah's planting; for they suppose him to have been their first king, and, in quitting Armenia, to have left behind him his mother, his wife, and several of his descendants, to people the country. These and many such-like fables are looked upon by the present Armenians as truths not to be called in question.

THE language of the antient Armenians was, according to Strabo, much the same with that of the Syrians; at least it is very plain from Polyænus<sup>r</sup>, that they used the Syriac characters. The modern Armenians use two languages, the vulgar and the learned; the latter, if we believe them, has no affinity with the other oriental languages, is very expressive, and enriched with all the terms of religion, and of arts and sciences; which, if true, shews that the Armenians were formerly men of much greater learning than they are at present. This language is to be found only in their antient manuscripts, and is used in divine service. To understand it well is reckoned a great accomplishment, and is all that is requisite to be admitted into the order of the Vertabiets, who make such a noise among the Armenians. The Vertabiets are doctors, and their province is to preach and instruct the people; when they once understand the learned language, and have got by heart a few sermons of Gregory Altenasi, a great master of it, and, as we may call him, their chief classic, they are abundantly qualified for that eminent degree (F).

THOUGH the modern Armenians are perhaps the greatest Their trade traders on the earth, yet we find no mention of any commerce carried on by them in antient times. Sha-Abbas the Great, king of Persia, is said to have been the first, who, considering the œconomy and indefatigable industry of this people, put them upon trade, and settled a colony of Armenians at Julfa, the famous suburbs of Ispahan, described by most of our modern travellers. This place contains at present above thirty thousand inhabitants, all Armenians and merchants (G). Though none of the antients have mentioned

(F) The Vertabiets are ordained, but their proper function is to preach. Their sermons generally turn upon very ill contrived parables, upon passages of the scripture, ill understood and worse explained, and upon ridiculous traditions : however, they deliver themselves with a great deal of gravity, and these discourses procure them as much credit and authority as the patriarch himself has. They challenge the sole power of excommunicating. After exercising themselves for some time in the villages and boroughs, they are with abundance of ceremonies admitted to the degree of doctor by an old Vertabiet, who puts into their hands a pastoral staff, which they are allowed to hold while they preach, and also to sit ; whereas the bishops, who are not Vertabiets, are obliged to preach standing. They live on the gatherings that are made for them after their sermons, which, we are told, are very considerable, especially in places where the caravans stop. They observe celibacy, and fast very rigorously three quarters of the year, abstaining not only from meat, but also from fish, eggs, and milk.

(G) Sha-Abbas, by settling a numerous colony at Julfa, and other colonies of Armenians in divers other parts of the kingdom, had two things in view, namely to secure his dominions from being attacked by the Turks, and to enrich them by trade and commerce. As Armenia was the chief place where the Turks used to make their attempts to penetrate into Persia, he unpeopled it so as to make it impossible for them to maintain an army in that country. The inhabitants of Julfa, the most populous and greatest city of Armenia, were ordered to retire with their effects to Ispahan, from whence they were soon after removed to the other side of the river Zenderou, to separate them from the Mohammedans, who despised them on account of their religion. This new settlement they called Julfa in memory of their antient habitation, the ruins whereof are to be seen to this day on the banks of the Araxes, between Eriwan and Tauris. The inhabitants of Nacsvan also were dispersed into several parts of the kingdom, and above twenty thousand Armenian families transplanted into the single province of Guilan. The king, having tioned the trade of the Armenians in former ages, yet the easy and safe navigation of the Tigris and Euphrates, and the example of their next and most industrious neighbours the Syrians, may perhaps have induced them to carry on a trade, as well for their own growth as for foreign productions; neither do we see by what other means they could acquire the great wealth they enjoyed under some of their kings. But as we find no mention of their trade in antient history, we shall take no farther notice of it.

S E C T. II.

The reigns of the kings of Armenia Major.

Artaxias.

OUR intent is to write of those kings only that reigned in Armenia after that people had shaken off the Macedonian yoke, which happened in the beginning of the reign of Antiochus the Great, when Zadriades and Artaxias, whom he had appointed governors or prefects of Armenia, entering into a conspiracy, and uniting their forces, stirred up the Armenians to a revolt, and caused themselves to be proclaimed kings of the provinces which were under their jurisdiction. As Antiochus was then very young, and his troops employed against other rebels, their attempts were attended with success beyond expectation, which encouraged them to pursue their conquests, and extend the boundaries of their new, but small, kingdom. Accordingly, invading with a considerable army the neighbouring countries, they took from the Medes the provinces of Caspiana, Phaunitis, and Basoropida; from the Iberians Chorzena and Gogarena on the other side of the Cyrus; from the Chalybes and Mossynæci, Pareneta and Xerxena, which bordered on Armenia Minor. By these having thus secured his frontiers, employed the Armenians in carrying on the silk trade, trusting them at first with a great many bales, to carry by caravans into foreign countries, on condition they should pay at their return for each bale a certain price settled by persons of judgment before their departure. For, their greater encouragement, he allowed them by way of reward for their pains and industry whatever they could get above the price agreed on, which was very reasonable. The success answered the hopes both of the king and the merchants, and silver and gold, which to that time had been very scarce in Persia, began to appear in great plenty at the return of the caravans. To that expedient the wealth of Persia is owing even to this day.

new acquisitions, Armenia, from a small province, became all on a sudden so considerable a kingdom, that Justin, in enumerating those of his time, gives it the preference in wealth, power, and extent, to any other, that of Parthia alone excepted. The conquerors, having thus enlarged their new territories, divided their conquests into two kingdoms; and on this occasion the division of Armenia into the Greater and Lesser was first introduced. Zadriades kept for himself that part which lay next to Cilicia, calling it the kingdom of Armenia Minor, and yielded the far greater part to Artaxias, which began to be known under the name of Armenia Major. Antiochus did not fail to lead a powerful army against them, but was not able to recover one single province of the many they had usurped. Wherefore, after many unsuccessful attempts, he at last concluded a peace with them, designing to fall upon them again after he had settled the affairs of his kingdom, which was then rent into several parties. But they in the mean time entering into an alliance with the Romans, secured to themselves and their posterity the provinces which they had usurped. Artaxias built the famous city of Artaxata, the metropolis of Armenia, and the seat of the kings of that country: Some say, as we have hinted above, that he followed therein the direction of Hannibal, whom they suppose to have fled into Armenia, after the defeat of Antiochus by Scipio Asiaticus. But it is not at all probable, that Artaxias, who owed, we may say, his crown to the Romans, and reigned under their protection, would entertain a sworn enemy of theirs. Artaxias enjoyed his kingdom peaceably to the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes, by whom his army was cut in pieces, and himself made prisoner, and put in irons<sup>r</sup>. We read of an embassy sent by him, four years after this misfortune, to Ariarathes king of Cappadocia, soliciting that prince to put to death Mithrobuzanes, one of the two sons of Zadriades, who had fled to him for shelter, and to assist him in the recovering of his kingdom. But Ariarathes sharply rebuked the ambassadors, and was so far from complying with their request, that he restored Mithrobuzanes to his father's kingdom; and moreover declared, that he would give no manner of assistance to one who could think him capable of committing such an infamous piece of treachery.

By whom Artaxias was succeeded is uncertain, the Armenian history being interrupted here with a chasm of about seventy years, for so many passed between the defeat of

Artaxias and the reign of Tigranes the Great ; which interruption may perhaps be owing, not to the want of writers, but of any thing worth writing performed by the intermediate princes. All we know of this time is, that Tigranes was by his father delivered up to the Parthians as an hostage, whence it is plain, that the Armenians had warred with the Parthians to their disadvantage. The Parthians set Tigranes at liberty upon the news of his father's death, having first obliged him to yield up to them a considerable part of his kingdom by way of ransom<sup>c</sup>.

Tigranes being thus restored to his father's kingdom, was prevailed upon in the beginning of his reign by Mithridates Eupator, to enter into an alliance with him against the Romans, whose power began to give jealousy to all the princes of Asia. One of the articles of agreement between these two kings was, that Mithridates should have the conquered cities and countries, and Tigranes the captives and plunder. In virtue of this treaty, Tigranes was to invade Cappadocia, which Mithridates had been lately obliged by a decree of the senate of Rome to give up to Ariobarzanes. But before either of the princes took the field, a marriage was solemnized, with all possible pomp and magnificence, between Tigranes and Cleopatra daughter to Mithridates. As soon as the nuptial solemnities were over, Mithridates sent his elder brother Socrates to invade Bithynia, and drive from that throne Nicomedes, whom the Romans had appointed king ; and Tigranes, according to his engagement, ordered Mithridates and Bagoas, his two chief commanders, to fall upon Cappadocia, which they reduced without the least opposition ; Ariobarzanes, who was but a very mean-spirited prince, having abandoned his kingdom and fled to Rome, upon the first news of their march. Tigranes having thus got possession of Cappadocia, enriched himself with the booty, but yielded the country to Ariarathes, Mithridates's son, whom he caused to be proclaimed with great pomp, and universal satisfaction of the people<sup>c</sup>. In the mean time the Syrians, being harassed with a long and intestine war of the Seleucidæ, who could not agree among themselves, invited Tigranes to take possession of their country, which he did accordingly, driving out the Seleucidæ, who were not in a condition to oppose him, and obliging Antiochus Pius not only to yield that part of Syria which he possessed, and extended from the Euphrates to the sea, but likewise great part of Cilicia. Tigranes must have made peace with the Romans soon after his expedition into Cappadocia, and left Mithridates in the lurch; for in the council of the Syrians, after they had resolved to call in a foreign king, three princes being proposed, namely Mithridates king of Pontus, Ptolemy king of Egypt, and Tigranes king of Armenia; the latter was unanimously chosen, and Mithridates rejected for no other reason but his being at war with the Romans<sup>u</sup>. Tigranes enjoyed Syria, without the least disturbance, for the space of eighteen years, till he was driven out by Pompey, and Syria reduced to the form of a Roman province. With this new addition of strength Tigranes, giving the reins to his aspiring and unbounded desire of power, invades Armenia Minor, kills king Artanes, who met him on the frontiers at the head of a considerable army, disperses his troops, and in one campaign reduces the whole kingdom. From Armenia Minor he marches his victorious army against the Asiatic Greeks, the Adiabeni-ans, and the Gordians, carrying all before him, and obliging the people, where-ever he came, to acknowledge him for their sovereign. From this second expedition he returned loaded with an immense booty, which he soon after increased with the spoils of Cappadocia, invading that kingdom the second time at the instigation of Mithridates, who had been obliged by the Romans to withdraw his forces from thence. From Cappadocia Tigranes, besides the other booty, brought back into Armenia no fewer than three hundred thousand captives, having surrounded the country with his numerous army in such manner that no one could escape him. These, together with the prisoners he had taken in his two first expeditions, he employed to build, and afterwards to people, a large and noble city, which he founded in the place, where the crown of Armenia had been first put upon his head, calling it from his own name Tigranocerta, that is, the city of Tigranes<sup>w</sup>. In the mean time Mithridates, who had concluded a peace with the Romans, but with no other design than to gain time and strengthen his party, sent a solemn embassy to Tigranes inviting him to enter into an alliance against the common enemy. Metrodorus Scepsius was at the head of this embassy, a man had in such respect and veneration by Mithridates, that he was commonly called the king's father: he was at first a philosopher of great note, and afterwards raised by the king to the dignity of a judge, with such an unbounded authority, that it was not lawful to appeal from his sentence to the king himself. So great was the opinion Mithridates had of his honesty. Tigranes before he returned any answer to this embassy, pressed Metrodorus to tell him honestly, whether he thought it adviseable for him to enter into a war with the Romans. Metrodorus at first declined giving any answer to such an unseasonable question, but being at last prevailed upon by the pressing instances of the king, replied, As I am an ambassador, I advise you to join your father-in-law against the Romans ; as a counsellor, I am for your living in peace and amity with so powerful a people. Tigranes informed the king of what he had said, supposing he would not take it amiss, nor entertain a worse opinion of his ambassador on the score of his sincerity. But it fell out otherwise, as was commonly believed, Metrodorus dying on the road as he was returning home, not without suspicion of poison. Tigranes, who had betrayed him, to express his concern, caused his body to be interred with the utmost magnificence. This prince at first refused to join Mithridates against the Romans, but in the end was prevailed upon by the importunity of his wife Cleopatra, to send him considerable supplies *, though he never came heartily into that war, not caring to provoke the Romans, who on their side kept fair with him, taking no notice, for the present, of the supplies he had sent to Mithridates. This unfortunate prince was soon after, upon the defeat of his army by Lucullus, forced to fly for shelter into Armenia, where he met with a very cold reception from his son-in-law, who would neither treat with him, nor see him, nor acknowledge him for his relation ; however, he promised to protect his person, and allowed him, in one of his castles, a princely retinue, and a table suitable to his former condition †. This total overthrow of Mithridates might well have made Tigranes open his eyes, and oppose with all his might the growing power of so formidable an enemy. But instead of that, leaving the Romans to pursue their conquests, he marches at the head of a very numerous army against the Parthians, with a design to recover the seventy vallies which the Parthians had extorted from him before they set him at liberty. Those he easily retook, and not satisfied with what had formerly belonged to the crown of Armenia, added to them all Mesopotamia, the countries that lay about Ninus and Arbela, and the fruitful province of Mygdonia, with the great and strong city of

Nisibis, called by the Greeks Antiochia Migdonica, the Parthians, though at that time a mighty people, flying everywhere before him <sup>2</sup>. From Mesopotamia he took his march towards Syria, to quell a rebellion which had been raised there by Cleopatra, surnamed Selene, who, after the death of her husband Antiochus Pius, reigned jointly with her sons in that part of Syria which Tigranes had not seized on. The malecontents were quickly reduced, that part of Syria which Cleopatra possessed, brought under subjection, and the queen herself taken prisoner, and confined to the castle of Seleucia, where she was soon after put to death by Tigranes's order <sup>3</sup>. From Syria he passed into Phœnice, Phœnice. which he subdued either intirely, or in great part, spreading far and wide the terror of his arms; insomuch, that all the princes of Asia, except those that were joined in alliance with the Romans, either in person, or by their deputies, submitted and paid homage to the conqueror. Among the others, Alexandria queen of Judæa, upon a report that Tigranes with an army of five hundred thousand men was ready to fall upon her kingdom, dispatched ambassadors, loaded with rich presents, to assure him, that she and the whole nation of the Jews coveted nothing more than the friendship of so powerful a prince, which they were willing to cultivate by all the good offices that lay in their power. The king, who was then employed in the siege of Ptolemais, which city not long after surrendered, commended them for undertaking so long a journey to do him homage, and bidding them be of good cheer, And all sent them back into Judæa <sup>4</sup>. Syria to Appian tells us, that Tigranes over-ran all the Syrian nations on this side of the Euphrates to the borders of Egypt <sup>5</sup>; and Lucullus in Plutarch's the bor- Phœnice <sup>6</sup> expressly says, that he made himself master of Palestine. Egypt. But on the other hand, Eutropius <sup>7</sup> and Josephus <sup>8</sup> write, that he stopt in Phœnice, and was master but of part of that country. And now Tigranes, elated with a long and uninterrupted series of victories and prosperous events, began to look upon himself as invincible, and far above the level of other crowned heads: he assumed the haughty title of king of kings, and had many kings waiting upon him in the nature of menial servants: he never appeared on horseback without the attendance of four kings running by his horse in livery: and when he gave answers to the nations that applied

By this time Lucullus, having intirely reduced the kingdom of Pontus, and wanting a pretence to fall upon Tigranes, sent Appius Claudius, his wife's brother, with the character of embassador, to demand of him Mithridates, who, as we have hinted before, had retired into Armenia, and lived there under the protection of his son-in-law Tigranes. Appius on his journey persuaded several princes, and among the others Zarbienus, king of the Gordians, to side with the Romans in case of a rupture between them and Tigranes. The embassador not finding the king at Epidaphne, or Antioch, he being gone from thence a few days before his arrival to reduce some cities of Phœnice, and being ordered to wait there till he returned, employed that time in soliciting the neighbouring cities to shake off the Armenian yoke, and join the Romans as soon as their army should appear in those parts, which they did accordingly. Tigranes being at last returned to Antioch, Appius in the audience which he had, told him abruptly, that he was come to demand Mithridates, as belonging to Lucullus's triumph; and, in case he did not readily comply with his demand, to proclaim war against him. Tigranes, though no ways accustomed to such freedom of speech, answered with a great deal of temper, that he had not himself approved of Mithridates's proceedings; but yet could not help having some regard for a man so nearly related to him; that all the world would condemn him, if he delivered his father-in-law into the hands of his sworn enemies; he was therefore unalterably resolved to stand by him, and protect him in his adverse fortune, and if the Romans should on that score make war upon him, or invade his dominions, he was in a condition to pay them back in their own coin. He was greatly offended that Lucullus in his letter did not give him the title of king of kings, and therefore in his answer would not so much as give him the title of general. He offered great presents to Appius, both for himself and Lucullus; but he accepted only of a gold cup, fearing the king might take it amiss, if he rejected them all<sup>c</sup>. In the mean time Tigranes being informed that Zarbienus king of the Gordians had entered into a private alliance with the Romans, put him, his wife and children to death ; and returning into Armenia, received with the greatest pomp and magnificence imaginable, his father-in-law Mithridates, whom to that time he had not admitted to his presence, though the unhappy prince had resided a year and eight months in his dominions ; they held several private conferences, and in the end Mithridates was sent back into Pontus with ten thousand horse to make a diversion by raising there what disturbances he could †.

ON the other hand Lucullus, hearing of the king's resolution, performed at Ephesus the vows which it was customary for the Roman generals to perform after having subdued a powerful enemy ; so confident was he of success. From Ephesus he marched back into Pontus, and from thence, after reducing the strong city of Sinope he began his march to Armenia Lucullus with two legions only and three thousand horse, having left marches Sornatius in Pontus with six thousand men to keep that king- into Ar- dom in awe, and defeat the designs of Mithridates ‡. He menia. took his rout through Cappadocia, where his army was abundantly supplied with all manner of provisions by Ariobarzanes, whom he had lately restored to that kingdom, and arrived in a few days at the Euphrates, which he passed without the least opposition, where it separates Cappadocia from Armenia (H). Having now entered the enemy's country, he detached two parties, one to besiege a city, wherein he was informed that Tigranes's concubines and great part of his treasures were kept ; the other under the command of Sextilius to block up Tigranocerta, in hopes of drawing the king to a battle. But Tigranes, after having put to death the scout that brought him the first intelligence of the Romans arrival,

(H) Plutarch informs us (7), That the Euphrates, being at that time swelled to an extraordinary height by reason of the winter rains, upon the arrival of Lucullus began to abate, insomuch that the waters being reduced by the next morning within their banks, afforded him an easy and safe passage. Whereupon the inhabitants began to look upon him as a god, and were confirmed in their opinion by what they reckoned a great prodigy ; for no sooner had he passed the river, but one of the oxen consecrated to the Parian Diana, though wild, and never caught without great difficulty by the barbarians, came of its own accord to offer itself to Lucullus for a sacrifice. He offered also a bull to the deity of the river in thanksgiving for his safe passage.

made towards mount Taurus, which he had appointed for the place of the general rendezvous <sup>b</sup>. Lucullus dispatched Muriæna in pursuit of the king, who having overtaken and engaged him in a narrow pass, put the Armenians to flight, and, besides all the king's baggage and carriages, carried back with him a great many prisoners, the king having fled in the beginning of the skirmish. Sextilius was attended with the like success against a large body of Arabians, which he fell in with, as they were marching to join the king; for Lucullus had sent out several parties to scour the country, and prevent the innumerable forces that were in full march on all sides, from drawing into one body. But notwithstanding all the diligence Lucullus could use, the king's army daily increased to a great degree, the Gordians, Medes, Arabians, Adiabeniensians, Albans, Iberians, and most of the inhabitants of the neighbouring kingdoms, flocking to him in great bodies, not so much out of any affection to the king, as upon a strong persuasion, that the Romans were come into those quarters with a design to ransack the country, and plunder their wealthy temples: this opinion, which was industriously spread abroad by Tigranes, armed, we may say, all Asia against Lucullus <sup>c</sup>. With these supplies the king's army, before he left mount Taurus, consisted according to Plutarch's <sup>d</sup> computation, of twenty thousand archers and slingers, fifty five thousand horse, and a hundred and fifty thousand foot, all armed cap-a-pee, besides thirty five thousand pioneers. But Lucullus was so far from being under any apprehension on account of the enemies numbers, that on the contrary the only thing he feared was, that Tigranes should follow Mitbridates's advice, which was not to engage the Romans, but by ravaging the country, distress them for want of provisions, a lesson he had learnt the year before at his own expence, since Lucullus by that means had made his army moulder away; and then carried several strong places without striking a blow. To divert the king from this resolution, Lucullus determined to decamp, and joining Sextilius at Tigranocerta, to carry on the siege of that place in good earnest, persuading himself, that Tigranes at the head of so numerous an army would never sit still, and suffer his wealthy metropolis to be taken and plundered under his eyes. As Lucullus imagined, so it fell out; for Tigranes having summoned a council of war, it was there unanimously resolved to attack the Romans, and relieve the place, before the enemy could receive any new supplies; and Taxiles, whom Mithridates had sent to dissuade the king from venturing a battle, was in danger of losing his head for disapproving their resolution. Pursuant to this determination, while the Romans were busied in carrying on their attacks before Tigranocerta, the king's army all on a sudden appeared on the tops of the neighbouring hills, and was welcomed with loud shouts and acclamations by those who were in the city, the hills and dales echoing on all sides, victory, victory. The Armenians within the town flocking to the walls, menaced from thence the Romans, shewing them the king's forces on the hills. Lucullus finding by the enemies motions that they were resolved to come to an engagement, left Muraena with six thousand foot to continue the siege, and marched himself with ten thousand foot only and about a thousand horse, to meet the king, who upon a view of the Roman camp, turning to those who attended him, If these men, said he, come as ambassadors, there is enow of them; but if they come as enemies they make but a very indifferent appearance. As Lucullus was drawing up his forces to pass a river which parted the two camps, and to attack the enemy, one of his officers suggested to him, that that day was marked in the kalendar as unlucky, the Romans under the conduct of Cepion having been defeated on that very day by the Cimbrians: the general replied calmly, It is therefore incumbent upon us to behave ourselves with more gallantry, that so dismal a day may henceforth become a day of joy and mirth for the people of Rome<sup>m</sup>. The Armenians suffered Lucullus to ford the river without the least molestation, which he had no sooner done, than charging the enemy in person at the head of his small army, to encourage his men, who were under no small apprehension, he forced the right wing to give ground, and with great slaughter of the enemies penetrated to the very centre. The Romans, thus encouraged by the example of their general, plied the Armenians so warmly with their javelins, that the whole army began to give way, and soon after betook themselves to a precipitous flight. The Romans pursued them a hundred and twenty furlongs, trampling all the way on heaps of dead bodies, till night coming on, obliged them to give over the dreadful carnage<sup>n</sup>. In this battle Lucullus performed the duty both of an experienced commander, and a gallant soldier; whereas

Tigranes behaved himself in a most cowardly manner, having quitted the field in the very beginning of the engagement, and, attended only by a hundred and fifty horse, saved himself in one of his castles <sup>o</sup>. Plutarch informs us <sup>p</sup>, that on the enemies side there fell a hundred thousand of the foot, and that but few of the cavalry escaped; whereas of the Romans five men only were killed, and a hundred wounded. Antiochus the philosopher, mentioning this fight <sup>q</sup>, says, that the sun never beheld the like; and Livy, that the Romans never fought at such a disadvantage as to numbers, the conquerors not equalling the twentieth part of the conquered (I). Tigranes on his flight meeting his son in as forlorn a condition as himself, resigned to him, not without many tears, his diadem and royal robes, bidding him shift for himself, and save those royal ensigns; the young prince delivered them to a trusty friend, who, being taken by the Romans, consigned them to Lucullus <sup>r</sup>.

IN the mean time Mithridates, having levied a considerable army, was marching to join Tigranes; when he received the dismal account of his overthrow, and soon after met the king himself quite disheartened, and in a great dread of being taken by the Romans. Mithridates no sooner saw him, but, dismounting from his horse, he tenderly embraced him, and, condoling his misfortune, resigned to him his own retinue, and royal apparel. Having by this friendly treatment cheered him up, he encouraged him, instead of bewailing unfruitfully his present disaster, to rally his troops, raise new supplies, and with fresh vigour renew the war, not questioning but by a prudent conduct he might easily repair, in another campaign, all the losses he had suffered in that. Tigranes was so taken with this obliging deportment, that he not only promised to follow Mithridates's advice, but moreover committed the whole management of the war to his conduct<sup>c</sup>, owning him fitter to deal with the Romans than himself. This conference was no sooner over, but Tigranes dispatched messengers to all his prefects, enjoining them to raise what forces they could: Magdates, who had been governor of Syria for the space of fourteen years together, was ordered to abandon that kingdom, and hasten with his army to the king's assistance: ambassadors were sent in the joint names of Mithridates and Tigranes to the neighbouring princes, particularly to Arfaces king of Parthia, soliciting them to rise up in arms against the common enemy, whose unbounded ambition aimed at nothing less than the empire of all Asia<sup>c</sup> (K).

WHILE the confederate kings were thus preparing to renew the war with more vigour than ever, Lucullus was employed in reducing the strong holds of Armenia. From the field of battle he marched back to Tigranocerta, which town was a few days after delivered up to him by the Greek mer-

(K) Among the remains of the fourth book of Sallust's history, we read the entire letter of Mithridates to Arfaces on this occasion; he extenuates the late victory, ascribing it rather to the rash and imprudent conduct of Tigranes, who engaged the enemy in narrow places, than to the Roman valour. Then addressing Arfaces, "But you, says he, who are lord of the great city of Seleucia, and the powerful kingdom of Persia, who possess immense riches, and are one of the greatest potentates of Asia, can you think the Romans will ever suffer you quietly to enjoy what the gods have liberally bestowed upon you? They are at war with all mankind, but exert their cruelty chiefly on those who have wherewithal to glut their avarice. They pillage kingdoms, sell the inhabitants for slaves, plunder the temples of the gods, acknowledging no other law but their own arbitrary will and pleasure. However, we are still in a condition, with your assistance, to defeat their impious designs. By shutting up the passes which lead from Armenia into Mesopotamia, you may easily make their army moulder away for want of provisions, and thereby gain to yourself the glory of suppressing great robbers, and relieving great kings. And this is what I earnestly intreat you to do, unless you had rather increase one day with the addition of our own kingdom the power of the common enemy, than by your friendship become a conqueror yourself." However Arfaces, or rather Pacorus, (for Arfaces was a name common to all the Parthian kings) could not be prevailed upon to come into Mithridates's measures, having promised to the ambassadors of Lucullus a strict neutrality.

These Manæus, governor of the place, distrusting their loyalty, had not only disarmed, but was moreover going to seize them; which the Greeks suspecting, provided themselves with cudgels, and, wrapping their garments about their arms instead of bucklers, fell upon the Armenians, and, stripping those they knocked down, enabled themselves with their armour to attack and gain some of the forts, which they immediately delivered up to the Romans, and thereby put them in possession of the town (L). From Tigranocerta Lucullus marched into the small kingdom of Gordyene, where he celebrated, with the utmost pomp and magnificence, the obsequies of king Zarbienus, whom Tigranes had put to death for entering into a private alliance with the Romans. Lucullus himself, after a short speech in commendation of the deceased, put fire to the funeral pile, which was the most stately and sumptuous that ever had been seen in Asia, being adorned with all the ensigns of royalty, and the richest spoils that were found in Tigranocerta. In this kingdom Lucullus found, besides immense sums of gold and silver, such store of provisions, as enabled

But Dio (10) informs us, that the inhabitants, mostly Cilicians, upon a difference that arose between them and the Armenians, let the Romans into the town by night. Memnon says (11), that Tigranes's commanders, having no hopes of relief, procured good conditions for themselves, and surrendered the town to Lucullus, who, besides many other things of great value, found in the king's coffers eight thousand talents in ready money: he allowed the soldiers to plunder the city, and moreover gave to each of them eight hundred drachmas; having found many players, gathered together from all parts by Tigranes, who was about to dedicate a new theatre, he employed them in interludes, which he exhibited for the diversion of the soldiery (12): the wives of the chief officers he sent back untouched to their husbands, and by that means gained them over to his side: the Greeks he sent to their own country, giving them wherewithal to defray the expences of their journey: he gave also leave to the Cappadocians, Cilicians, Iberians, &c. who had been transplanted thither against their will, to return to their respective homes: and thus by the ruin of one, many cities, recovering their inhabitants, were restored to their antient splendor, and ever afterwards looked upon Lucullus as their founder.

him to pursue the war without putting the republic to any manner of charges †.

IN the mean time the two confederate kings, having levied new forces, were taking the field, and had appointed their troops to rendezvous in the spacious plains on the other side of mount Taurus: Whereupon Lucullus, leaving Gorayene, began his march, and passing the Taurus, encamped close by the enemy. There happened several skirmishes between the parties that were sent out to forage, without any considerable advantage on either side; but Lucullus could by no means draw them to a general engagement. Whereupon he resolved to decamp and lay siege to Artaxata, where Tigranes had left his wife and children with the greater part of his treasures. But he had scarce formed his camp when the enemy appeared, and sat down close by him, with the small river of Arsmia between the two camps. Lucullus did not allow them time to fortify their camp, but immediately drawing out his forces, and passed the river, and charged the Mardian and Iberian horse, in whom Tigranes chiefly confided, with such vigour, that after a faint resistance they betook themselves to flight; and put the whole army in confusion. The Romans pursued them all night with great slaughter, took the chief officers prisoners, and returned the next day to the siege loaded with an immense booty. In this battle there fell on the enemy's side more officers and persons of distinction than in the former, though the slaughter was not near so great. Mithridates being under great apprehension of falling into the Romans hands, fled in the very beginning of the battle, and his example was soon followed by Tigranes, who withdrew into the most remote parts of his dominions. The Romans, however, could not prevail upon the governor of Artaxata, either by threats or promises, to surrender the city; and in the mean time great quantity of snow falling, and the cold growing very severe, though it was no later in the year than the autumnal equinox, the soldiers requested Lucullus by their tribunes to break up the siege, and allow them to retire into winter quarters; which he rejecting with indignation, the whole army having caused the retreat to be sounded, retired in the dead of the night from before the city, and abandoned the enterprise, notwithstanding all Lucullus could say or do to put them in mind of their duty. However, he prevailed upon some of the legions to follow him into Mygdonia, a warm and fruitful country, and there in hopes of a great booty to lay siege to Nisibis or Antiochia Mygdonica <sup>v</sup>. This city was built by the Macedonians, as Josephus informs us <sup>w</sup>, and had been taken some years before from the Parthians by Tigranes, who had placed there many things of great value. It was very strong of itself, and defended by a numerous body of chosen troops commanded by Guras brother to Tigranes, having under him Callimachus, who was famed for his skill in fortification, and had lately defended the city of Amisus with incredible bravery. The Romans met with a warmer reception than they expected, but nevertheless after some months carried the place, having by the favour of a dark and stormy night, which had obliged the centinels to abandon their posts, got over the ditch, and scaled the wall, without being perceived by the enemy. Those who fled into the castle, surrendered upon terms, among whom Guras, who was treated very generously by Lucullus; but Callimachus he loaded with chains for having set on fire the city of Amisus after the Romans had got possession of it, and thereby deprived him of an opportunity of obliging the Greeks by preserving it, as he intended to do. Callimachus promised to discover great sums of gold which lay hid under ground, provided he would give him his liberty; but could not by any means appease his resentment <sup>x</sup>. Here Lucullus passed the winter to the great satisfaction of the soldiery; but as he was preparing early in the spring to take the field, and march out against Mithridates and Tigranes, who had again invaded Cappadocia, the legions refused to follow him, nor could he bring them to a sense of their duty, though he went in person from tent to tent, embracing the most refractory, and entreating them with tears in his eyes to serve but one campaign more, which he assured them would put an end to the war, and enrich the conquerors with the spoils of two wealthy kingdoms. But all was to no purpose; the mutineers, throwing their empty purses at his feet, replied, that as he had enriched himself alone, so he should carry on the war by himself. Thus was that great commander forced to sit still, and suffer the enemy to plunder before his eyes the allies of the Roman people, and recover in great part the countries which he had taken from them. This sedition was stirred up and fomented by P. Clodius, brother to Lucullus's wife, a man of a restless and mutinous temper, and whom Lucullus for his base behaviour had turned out of a commission, which he himself had given him. Clodius was supported by Pompey's party at Rome, where Lucullus was charged with spinning out the war, in order to be continued in the command of the army, which he employed, said his enemies, not in subduing kings, but in plundering their countries, and enriching himself with the booty. The charge perhaps was not ill-grounded; for had Lucullus after the first or second battle pursued Tigranes, he might very easily have prevented his raising a new army, and thereby have put an end to the war; but the hopes of booty made him after both battles abandon the enemy, and attack those places in which he had heard the king's treasures were kept; and truly the riches, which he heaped up in this and the Mithridatic war, are almost inconceivable. This gave his enemies a plausible pretence to stir up the people against him, having employed the forces of the republic in carrying on a war for his own private ends. Whereupon a law was at last published by C. Manlius, tribune of the people, whereby Lucullus was enjoined to resign to Pompey the legions and provinces under his command, together with the whole management of the war against Mithridates and Tigranes. This law was greatly opposed, but to no effect, by the nobility, who, though they did not approve of Lucullus's conduct, yet could not help thinking him highly injured by the people; since Pompey was sent rather to take possession of the spoils of a conquered enemy, than to carry on a war, and to triumph rather than to fight <sup>1</sup>. Lucullus met Pompey at the castle of Danala in Galatia, and endeavoured to persuade him to return, since Pontus and Armenia were already as good as conquered, and the kings not in a condition to oppose the Roman forces; but Pompey answering that he could not do otherwise than obey the orders of the republic, a quarrel arose between them, Lucullus upbraiding Pompey with an unbounded ambition, and Pompey Lucullus with an insatiable avarice; and neither could be said, as Velleius Paterculus observes, to lay any thing to the other's charge that was not true <sup>2</sup>. At last Pompey removed his camp, forbidding under severe penalties any one to come near Lucullus, or obey him; and Lucullus set out on his journey to Rome, where he was received by the senate with all the possible marks of honour and esteem. He brought along with him great store of valuable books, with

IN the mean time Mithridates and Tigranes had over-run Cappadocia, and recovered all Armenia, with great part of Pontus, and would have gained greater advantages, had not Tigranes's son, by name also Tigranes, taking up arms against his father, obliged him to divide his troops. The father and son coming to a pitched battle, the latter was put to flight, and forced to save himself in Parthia, where being joined by the discontented Armenians, he persuaded Phrabates king of the Parthians to declare war against his father, and invade Armenia; which he did at the head of a very numerous army, laying siege to Artaxata, and obliging Tigranes the elder to hide himself in the mountainous parts of his kingdom<sup>b</sup>. Phrabates, finding the city in a condition to stand a long siege, left part of his forces with Tigranes the younger, and returned home; which Tigranes the father hearing, he immediately abandoned the fastnesses of the mountains, and falling upon his son at the siege of Artaxata, dispersed the rebels with great slaughter, and entered his metropolis in triumph. Tigranes the son fled first to Mithridates, but finding him reduced to great straits, having been overcome a few days before by Pompey with the loss of forty thousand men, he went over to the Romans, and led them into Armenia against his father, as an ally of Mithridates. By his advice Pompey marched against Artaxata, where the king then resided, who hearing of his march, dispatched deputies to him, offering to surrender the city upon certain conditions, which Pompey rejected at the instigation of Tigranes the younger; though the deputies brought along with them in chains the ambassadors that Mithridates had sent to solicit succours against the Romans. Hereupon the king being quite dispirited, and not in a condition, after the revolt of his son, to withstand the enemy, took a resolution to go and meet Pompey in person, and as he had a great opinion of his clemency and good nature, to put himself, without any reserve, into his hands, and acquiesce to such conditions as he should think fit to grant him. Accordingly he set out for the camp, which was within fourteen miles of the city, and was met at some distance by a party of Roman horse detached from the army to escort him. As he entered the works, two lictors sent by Pompey desired him to dismount, Tigranes no-body being allowed to come into the Roman camp on puts him-horseback. The king readily obeyed, and, unbuckling his self into sword, delivered it into their hands. As soon as Pompey, Pompey's who went on foot to meet him, appeared, pulling off his dia-bands, dem, he threw himself at his feet; but Pompey embracing him, raised him up, and with his own hand put the diadem again on his head. He afterwards conducted him to his tent, and there gave him audience, sitting between him and his son, who did not so much as rise up when his father came in, nor take any notice of him<sup>c</sup>. The king expatiated in commendation of Pompey, saying, that he was come not to propose, but to accept whatever conditions he should think fit to offer him; that he did not look upon it as any disparagement to his royal dignity to own himself conquered by one whom fortune had raised above the rest of mankind, and that he had such an opinion of his justice, honour, and generosity, as to think himself safer in his camp, than he could be in his own metropolis. Pompey afterwards invited them both to supper; but the son absented himself, which was the first thing that made Pompey conceive some jealousy of him<sup>d</sup>. The next day Pompey, after hearing both parties, (for Tigranes had appealed to him for justice against his son) restored the kingdom of Armenia to the father, with the greatest and Who re- best part of Mesopotamia; but set a fine upon him of six stores him thousand talents for making war upon the people of Rome to the without cause. To the son he gave the government of the kingdom of provinces of Gordyene and Sophene; but the treasures that Armenia. were kept in the latter, he adjudged to the father, because, without them, he could not pay the fine. The son being thus disappointed, endeavoured first to make his escape, and afterwards, by private messengers, solicited the inhabitants of Sophene not to deliver the treasures to his father; which Pompey taking very much amiss, caused him to be kept in irons, and even then he found means to stir up Phrabates king of the Parthians, whose daughter he had married, against the Romans, and to form a conspiracy against his father's life; whereupon Pompey sent him in chains to Rome, where he was kept in the house of L. Flavius a senator; till the tribuneship of P. Clodius, who, being bribed with a large sum of money, set him at liberty in spite of Pompey and the senate<sup>c</sup>. The father willingly yielded to the Romans Cappadocia, Cilicia, Syria, and that part of Phœnice which he possessed, contenting himself with his paternal kingdom, and not only paid the fine laid upon him, but moreover made large presents to Pompey, and to all the officers and soldiers of his army, which gained him the title of a friend and ally of the Roman people<sup>f</sup>. He afterwards waged war with Phrabates II. king of the Parthians, by whom he was overcome, and would have been driven out of his kingdom, had not a peace been soon concluded between them by the mediation of Pompey<sup>g</sup>. He ever afterwards cultivated a strict friendship and amity with the Romans; insomuch that he not only refused to receive Mithridates, who fled to him after he had been routed by Pompey near mount Stella, but even offered a reward of one hundred talents to any one that should put him to death. His second son also, by name Sariaſter, took up arms against him; but, by the assistance of the Romans, that rebellion was soon quelled. He died in the eighty fifth year of his age, and was succeeded by his son Artuaſdes, called by Joſephus<sup>h</sup> Artabazes, by Oroſius<sup>i</sup> Artabanes, and by others Artoadiſtes.

At last he brought them into the province of Atropatene, where Statianus, who commanded a body of twenty thousand Romans, being set upon by the Medes and Parthians, while his men were tired with their long and tedious march, was killed, and his whole army cut in pieces. Polemo king of Pontus, who had joined the Romans, was taken prisoner, and with him a great many commanders of distinction, who were come to serve in the Roman army; but of the Romans themselves not one out-lived that battle.

After this overthrow Artuasdes marched back with his forces into Armenia, leaving Marc Antony at the siege of Phrahata in Media Atropatena, which he was soon after obliged to raise, and make a precipitate retreat into Armenia, being closely pursued the whole way by the joint forces of Parthians and Medes. After twenty seven days march he passed the Araxes, which divides Media Atropatena from Armenia; and having here mustered his army, found that he had lost in that expedition twenty thousand foot, and four thousand horse, with all the military engines and baggage of the army <sup>k</sup>. He was met on the frontiers of Armenia by Artuasdes, whom he was so far from upbraiding with his treachery, that, on the contrary, he received him with greater demonstrations of friendship and kindness than ever he had done before. Thus he dissembled his resentment for the present (and no-body was a greater master of the art of dissembling than he) for fear of provoking the king, who had a powerful army on foot; whereas the Romans were in extreme want of all things, and no-ways in a condition either to face an enemy or pursue their march. He prevailed upon Artuasdes, what by promises, what by his obliging behaviour, to allow his troops winter-quarters in Armenia; which being granted, he hastened to the castle of Leucocome, between Berytus and Sidon, where he had appointed Cleopatra to meet him. During his stay here he invited Artuasdes into Egypt, pretending to have some affairs of great moment to impart to him; but the king, suspecting his real design, excused himself, as though the affairs of his kingdom required his presence. Antony suspecting that the king mistrusted him, to remove all jealousy, sent Q. Dellius to him, with the character of ambassador, to propose a match between the king's daughter and his son Alexander, whom he had by Cleopatra; and then removed, as it was now the beginning of the spring, to the city of Nicopolis in Armenia Minor. From Nicopolis he dispatched messengers to Artuasdes, inviting him, as an ally of the Roman people, and a friend in whom he reposed an intire confidence, to come and assist him with his advice in the war which he was about to undertake against the Parthians. The king Artuasdes again excused himself at first, but was in the end prevailed treacherously upon, partly by his friends, partly by Antony's promises and repeated expressions of friendship and kindness, to wait upon taken, and him in his camp, where he was immediately seized, and, by put in Antony's order, loaded with chains, and forced, through fear irons by Marc An- tony.

of a more severe treatment, to discover his treasures, which Antony appropriated to himself. The Armenians, upon the news of the king's captivity, placed his eldest son Artaxias on the throne, who, having ventured a battle with the Romans, was defeated, and obliged to shelter himself among the Parthians, leaving his new kingdom a prey to the insatiable avarice of Antony, who, returning into Egypt with a great booty, entered Alexandria in triumph, Artuasdes, with his wife and children, being led by his chariot in golden chains. He afterwards presented them to Cleopatra sitting in a chair of gold; but neither the king, nor any of the Armenian captives, could be induced to give her the title of queen, though Antony had commanded her to be honoured by all with the title of queen of kings. Antony bestowed the kingdom of Armenia on Alexander his son by Cleopatra, whom he married to Jotape the daughter of Artavasdes king of the Medes. As for Artuasdes king of Armenia, he was, not long after, put to death by Antony's orders, and his head sent as a present to his rival the king of Media<sup>1</sup>.

Artaxias, the eldest son of Artuasdes, was by the Armenians proclaimed king upon the first news of his father's captivity; but being overcome by the Romans, as we have mentioned above, was obliged to abandon his kingdom, and fly into Parthia, from whence he soon returned at the head of a numerous army of Parthians and Armenians, and, having defeated the Medes who were joined in alliance with Alexander, recovered his paternal kingdom; but did not long enjoy it, being strangled, as Tacitus informs us<sup>m</sup>, by the treachery of his nearest friends, or driven from the throne, as we read in Josephus<sup>n</sup>, by Archelaus king of Cappadocia, and Claudius Tiberius Nero, afterwards emperor.

Artaxias II. being put to death, or, as others will have it, driven from the throne, the kingdom of Armenia was by Tiberius whom Augustus had sent to settle the affairs of the east, bestowed on his younger brother Tigranes. Tiberius himself put the crown on his head, honouring him with the title of a friend and ally of the Roman people<sup>o</sup>. Tigranes, after a short reign, was, by Tiberius's orders, put to death, without any regard to the intimate friendship that had once passed between them, for keeping a private correspondence with the enemies of Rome. He was succeeded, if we believe

AFTER the death of Tigranes and his sons, the kingdom of Armenia was given by Augustus to Artuasdes, whom some will have to have been the son of Artaxias II. but the Armenians, already tired with the Roman yoke, drove him out, and called in Phrabates king of Parthia, chusing to live in subjection to the Parthians rather than to the Romans<sup>q</sup>. This revolt gave great uneasiness to Augustus, who, as he was now stricken in years, could neither head the army in person, nor had he any one whom he could trust with the command of it, Tiberius having withdrawn himself from all public affairs. At last he pitched upon Caius, whom he had not long before adopted, a youth of no experience, and quite unfit for such an expedition, being then only in the nineteenth year of his age; however, at the approach of the Roman army, which was commanded, under Caius, by Marcus Lollius, whose daughter, or niece, Caius had married, Phrabates withdrew his army from Armenia, and sued for peace, which Caius readily granted him, on condition that he should give no manner of assistance to Tigranes, who, on the retreat of the Parthians, had caused himself to be proclaimed king<sup>r</sup>. Caius having now to deal with Tigranes alone, drove him in a few days out of Armenia; from whence, the war being ended there, and Artuasdes restored to the throne, he marched into Syria. In the mean time Artuasdes, or, as some stile him, Artabazes, being dead, Tigranes sent embassadors to Augustus with rich presents, begging of him the kingdom of Armenia. As in his letter to Augustus he did not write himself king, the emperor accepted the presents, and in his answer enjoined him, not without giving him hopes of obtaining his request, to wait upon Caius, who was at that time in Syria<sup>s</sup>; but Tigranes trusting more to his sword than the emperor's fair words, having raised a considerable body of Armenians, made himself master of several strong holds, and thereby got possession of great part of Armenia. This obliged Caius to quit Syria, and march his army back into the countries which he had left a few months before as quite settled. On his ar-

The governor of the place, not at all daunted at the sight of so powerful an army, invited Caius to a private conference, as if he designed to betray the castle; and having insensibly drawn the unwary prince close to the wall, dangerously wounded him, and got safe into the city. This treachery incensed the Romans to such a degree, that betaking themselves to their arms, they carried the place by assault, and levelled it with the ground, after having put all the garison to the sword (M). The other cities of Armenia submitted to the conqueror, and Tigranes being again driven out, Ariobarzanes, a Mede by birth, was, at the request of the Armenians, placed by Caius on the throne <sup>c</sup>. After the reduction of Armenia, Caius falling into a lingering distemper, occasioned by his wound, resigned the command of the army, and begged Augustus to give him leave to lead a private life in some remote corner of the earth, and not oblige him to shew himself at Rome, since the indisposition of his body had, in no small degree, likewise affected his mind. Augustus intreated him to return at least into Italy; and he, with great reluctancy, undertook the journey, but died at Limyra, a city of Lycia <sup>u</sup>.

(M) Florus relates the fact thus (13): Domitius, whom Tigranes had made governor of Artaxata, feigning a revolt, fell upon Caius while he was perusing a paper which he had given him, as containing an account of the treasures lodged in the city. He was wounded, adds Florus, but soon recovered. The Romans, having carried the place by assault, set fire to it, into which the governor, who was wounded, throwing himself, gave, with his death, satisfaction to Cæsar, who outlived him. Sextus Rufus, in his breviary, follows Florus; but as this had been transacted in Parthia, and not in Armenia, subjoins, that the Parthians, to atone for such a piece of treachery, did then, for the first time, give hostages to Octavianus Cæsar, and restored the ensigns which they had taken in the Cassian war. He confounds what Suetonius (14) wrote of the Parthians, with what others relate of the Armenians, mistaking all along Claudius for Caius, which led Jornandes into the same mistake, and also Georgius Syncellus in his Greek chronicle.

In his room he placed his own son, by name Orodes, who was not long after overcome by Germanicus, and forced to yield the crown to Zeno, the son of Polemo king of Pontus, who, after his accession to the crown, was called Artaxias, from the city of Artaxata, where he received the crown from Germanicus w. Artaxias enjoyed the crown peaceably for the space of sixteen years, and was succeeded by Arsaces, whom his father Artabanus sent, upon the news of Artaxias's death, to invade Armenia. Arsaces, with the assistance of the Medes and Parthians, without much trouble, got possession of that kingdom; but was treacherously murdered in the first year of his reign by his own servants, at the instigation of Mithridates Iberus and his brother Pharasmenes king of Iberia, whom Tiberius had stirred up against him. Artabanus hearing of his son's death, sent back his other son Orodes into Armenia, at the head of a numerous army, which was routed by Pharasmenes, who singling out Orodes himself, dangerously wounded him, and would have dispatched him, had not his guards come timely to his rescue. Pharasmenes being master of the field, took several cities by storm, and amongst others Artaxata, which he dismantled. ceiving some jealousy of Mithridates Iberus, caused him to be sent in chains to Rome, where he was kept close prisoner till the reign of Claudius, by whom he was restored to his kingdom <sup>2</sup>. During his imprisonment at Rome, the Parthians had seized on most of the strong holds of Armenia, which he soon recovered with the assistance of his brother Pharasmenes and the Roman legions. The Romans reduced the forts and cities, while the Iberians, under the command of Pharasmenes, kept the field to make head against Demonaxtes, general of the malecontent Armenians, who, having ventured a battle, was slain, and his whole army cut in pieces. This victory put Mithridates in possession of all Armenia <sup>3</sup>; but he did not long enjoy his kingdom, being taken off by a storm, which broke out from a quarter whence he least expected it. The fact is thus related by Tacitus <sup>4</sup>; Pharasmenes had a son, by name Rhadamistus, a daring young man, of extraordinary parts, and no less beloved by his own countrymen for his obliging behaviour, than esteemed by the neighbouring nations, in regard of his military exploits. The uncommon affection which the Iberians of all ranks shewed him, joined to the eager desire which he had betrayed on several occasions of ascending the throne, gave his father, who was advanced in years, no small uneasiness. To divert him therefore from attempting any thing upon his own person or kingdom, he cunningly turned his thoughts upon Armenia, telling him, that that kingdom belonged of right not to Mithridates, but to himself, who had rescued it from the Parthians; and that the world might very justly condemn him as a mean-spirited prince, and an unkind father, should he suffer his brother to enjoy quietly a kingdom that was due to his own son. Having thus inflamed the young man's ambition, they both agreed, that the safest way to compass their design was, at first, to use policy; and that Rhadamistus, pretending to fall out with his father, should fly to his uncle Mithridates, as not being able to brook the ill treatment he met with at home from his father and step mother. Mithridates pitying his condition, received and entertained him as if he had been his own child; but this kindness did not prevent Rhadamistus from privately stirring up to sedition such of the chief men as he found disaffected to Mithridates; whom after he had gained and disposed for a revolt, feigning a reconciliation with his father, he returned home, and acquainted him to what pass he had brought matters by policy.

Pharasmenes thinking it now necessary to employ force, under pretence that Mithridates had dissuaded the Romans from lending him any aid against the Albanians, sent his son at the head of a powerful army to invade Armenia, and take revenge of such an unnatural proceeding. This unexpected irruption, and the revolt of several chief lords of Armenia, obliged Mithridates, not knowing whom to trust, to shut himself up in the castle of Gorneas, a place looked upon as impregnable, and defended by a Roman garison, Cælius Pullio being governor, and Casperius, a man of no less honesty than courage, his centurion. Rhadamistus having attempted in vain to reduce the place by force, and tired out his men without making any progress in the siege, had recourse to another method, which was to offer the governor, whom he knew to be venal, a large sum of gold, on condition he delivered Mithridates into his hands. Pullio shewed no disinclination to this proposal; but Casperius openly protested, that no bribes should ever prevail upon him to betray an ally of Rome, or suffer the kingdom of Armenia, a gift of the Roman people, to be shamefully sold; however, he agreed to a suspension of arms, with a design to try in the mean time, whether he could persuade Pharasmenes to call home his son, and in case of refusal, to acquaint T. Venidius Quadratus, governor of Syria, with the posture of affairs in Armenia. Casperius was scarce departed, when Pullio, lying now under no check, began openly to treat with the enemy, and, being gained with large sums, forced, rather than persuaded, Mithridates to consent to an interview with his nephew. The time and place being appointed for the conference, Mithridates went out of the castle, attended by a small guard, and was received with all the marks of friendship and respect by Rhadamistus, who falling down at his feet, embraced them, giving him, with great shew of tenderness, the title of father, and swearing by all the gods, that he should not receive any hurt at his hands, either by the sword, or by poison. Afterwards he invited him into a neighbouring grove, pretending he had caused a sacrifice to be got ready there, that the peace might be confirmed, and their antient friendship renewed in the presence of the gods. It was a custom among the orientals in those days, in concluding a peace, or striking an alliance, to join their right hands, and bind together the thumbs of the contracting parties with a running knot, which, by one of the company, was drawn so tight, as to make the blood start out at the least prick. This blood they mutually licked, deeming their friendship ever after sacred and inviolable, as being ratified by each other's blood. The person who was to perform this ceremony between Mithridates and Rhadamistus, taking hold of Mithridates unawares, threw him down on the ground, and others running in, loaded him with chains, and hurried him away, his wife and little children filling the air with their cries, till they were also apprehended, and all thrust into covered waggons, where they were kept under a strong guard, till Pharasmenes's pleasure was known. That wicked prince, without any regard to the ties of friendship or blood, ordered his brother and daughter, who was wife to Mithridates, to be put to death without delay ; which order was executed by his son, who, mindful of the oath he had taken not to hurt them by poison or the sword, caused them to be laid on the ground, and pressed to death. Mithridates's children, who were very young, underwent the same fate, tho' Rhadamistus had received no such orders, because they bewailed their father's misfortune. The whole family of Mithridates being thus extinct, Rhadamistus took possession of the kingdom of Armenia ; which when Quadratus governor of Syria understood, he summoned a council of the chief officers, to advise with them about the measures that were to be taken on such an extraordinary emergency. He himself was for pursuing with fire and sword the authors of so cruel and treacherous an action ; but most of the counsellors were of opinion, that no notice should be taken of the death of Mithridates, alledging, that it was not their business to discountenance, but rather to promote, all manner of wickedness and treachery among the barbarians, that being odious to each other, and divided among themselves, they might the more easily be kept in awe and subjection to Rome. They added, that the Roman princes, being well apprised of this policy, had bestowed Armenia sometimes upon one, and sometimes upon another family, with no other view than to raise jealousies among the enemies of Rome, and set them together by the ears. This opinion prevailed ; but however, lest they should forego their right to the disposal of Armenia, they dispatched messengers to Pharasmenes, injoining him to withdraw his troops from that kingdom. In the mean time Julius Pelignus, governor of Cappadocia, a noted coward, and no less contemptible for his person than infamous for his vices, but highly in favour with the emperor Claudius, with whom he had formerly lived in great intimacy, having drawn together the auxiliaries of the provinces, as if he designed to recover Armenia, began to ravage and plunder the neighbouring provinces, without distinction of friend or foe. At last being abandoned by his own people, he had recourse to Rhadamistus, whom he encouraged, being gained by rich presents, to assume the title of king king of Armenia; and assisted in person at his coronation; which when the governors of the neighbouring provinces heard, that the ignominy of such an infamous action might not redound upon them, they sent Helvidius Priscus with a legion into Armenia, to compose the unsettled state of affairs in that kingdom; but were obliged to recal him before he could execute his commission, being informed that Tiridates, at the head of a formidable army of Parthians; was already arrived on the frontiers, with a design to assert the antient right of his family to that crown.

Tiridates was brother to Vologeses king of Parthia; who, tho' he laid claim to the kingdom of Armenia as held by some of his ancestors, and had even named his younger brother Tigranes to that crown, as soon as he ascended the throne of Parthia, yet, as he did not care to engage in a war with the Romans, had kept quiet at home during the reign of Mithridates Iberus, whom they had placed on the throne; but when he heard that Rhadamistus, by the murder of that prince and destruction of his family, had usurped a crown to which he had no imaginable right or title, he then assembled all his forces, and heading them in person, marched into Armenia, to ascertain his claim by dint of arms. Rhadamistus, not daring to face so formidable an enemy, retired with his Iberians in proportion as the Parthians advanced. The cities of Artaxata and Tigranocerta voluntarily submitted, and the other strong holds were ready to follow their example; but in the mean time winter coming on, which proved very severe, and a great scarcity of provisions ensuing, such a mortality began to rage in the Parthian army, as obliged Vologeses to abandon the enterprize, and in all speed return home.

UPON their departure, Rhadamistus again invaded Armenia, now more outrageous and bloody than ever, as incensed against a people that had already abandoned him; and were still ready to revolt on the first occasion; insomuch, that the Armenians, tho' inured to slavery, could not brook his tyrannical government. Having therefore formed a conspiracy, they rose up in arms, secured the king's guards, and invested the palace, with a design to retaliate upon him his cruelty towards Mithridates; but both he and his wife Zenobia found means to make their escape on horse-back. Zenobia, who was big with child, being soon tired with the violence of the motion, and not able to keep up with her husband, begged him to deliver her by an honourable death from an ignominious captivity. At first he embraced her with great tenderness, and encouraged her to bear the fatigue of the flight a little longer; but at last, finding that she was ready to faint away, and being struck with fear, lest, if he left her, some other might possess her, he drew his scymetar, and having wounded her, dragged her to the banks of the Araxes, committing her body to the water. He himself pursued his flight full speed, till he reached Iberia the kingdom of his father. In the mean time some shepherds finding the body of Zenobia floating near the shore, with manifest signs of life, and gathering from her beautiful aspect that she was of no mean rank, bound up her wound, and carried her to Artaxata; from whence, her name and misfortune being known, she was conveyed, at the expence and care of that city, to Tiridates, who received and entertained her as a queen <sup>b</sup>.

Tiridates. NOT long after Rhadamistus returned again into Armenia, at the head of a powerful army of Iberians; but was anew driven out by the Parthians, who being soon obliged, by their intestine broils, to return home, that unhappy kingdom was the fourth time invaded by Rhadamistus, and he the same year forced by the Parthians, after they had settled their own affairs, to abandon it. The Armenians being thus harassed, and their country near quite destroyed by the Parthians and Iberians, resolved to send a solemn embassy to Rome, to lay the state of their desolate nation before the emperor Nero, and beg him to give them a king that could deliver them from the unexpressible calamities they groaned under. Hereupon the emperor appointed Domitius Corbulo to settle the affairs of Armenia, and divided the forces of the east, so that part of the auxiliaries, with two legions, were to remain in Syria, under the command of Numidius Quadratus, governor of that province, and an equal number of allies and Romans was assigned to Corbulo, with an addition of the cohorts and other troops which wintered in Cappadocia. The confederate kings were ordered to make ready their forces, and obey either, according to the exigencies of the war. The legions were completed, and posted on the borders of Armenia; bridges were made on the Euphrates, and all things got ready to invade the Parthian territories; however, both Corbulo and Quadratus thought fit, before they began hostilities, to exhort Vologeses by messages to prefer peace to war, and, by the delivery of hostages, to maintain that reverence towards the Roman people which his ancestors were wont to pay. Vologeses to gain time, and to remove, under the name of hostages, such as might aspire to the crown, delivered up the most illustrious of the family of the Artacides. They were received by Histeius a centurion, whom Quadratus had dispatched to the king for this very end ; which Corbulo no sooner heard than he sent Arrius Varus, prefect of a cohort, to take them ; and hence a quarrel arose between the centurion and the prefect. The decision of the difference being referred to the hostages themselves and the deputies who conducted them, they preferred the pretensions of Corbulo * (N).

In the mean time, Vologeses having, with the utmost expedition, drawn together his troops, openly declared, that he would neither suffer his brother Tiridates to be driven from a kingdom which he himself had conferred upon him, nor to hold it as a gift from any other power. On the other side, Corbulo was resolved to recover what had been formerly gained by Lucullus and Pompey ; and moreover, the Armenians implored the protection both of the Romans and Parthians, though they were, generally speaking, more addicted to the latter, as being linked with them in marriages, and not unlike in manners. To Corbulo it proved a far greater labour to bring his troops under discipline than to subdue the enemy ; for the legions brought out of Syria, by a long peace grown lazy and idle, bore with much impatience the toils of war. There were many veterans among them that had never stood centry, nor had ever seen a camp or intrenchment, having fulfilled the time of their service in cities, where they gave themselves up to all manner of debauchery. Corbulo therefore, having discharged such as were unfit for military duties, caused levies to be made in Cappadocia and Galatia, and to these was added a legion from Germany, with some troops of horse, and a detachment from the cohorts. To inure the soldiery to hardships, he kept the army encamped in the open fields the whole winter, tho' the frost was so violent, that they could not, without much labour, break the ground, in order to pitch their tents. Many lost the use of their limbs by the cold ; and some, as they stood centry, were frozen to death. The fate of one soldier was very remarkable ; for his hands, as he carried a bundle of wood, mortified, and, as he still clasped the burden, dropped from his arms as if they had been cut off. Corbulo himself, in a thin habit, and bare-headed, whether they marched or worked, was continually encouraging them, more by his example than by speeches. As many, refusing to bear the rigour of the season, began to desert, he had recourse to severity ; for he did not proceed as in other armies, where the first, and also the second offence was forgiven ; but instantly put to death such as deserted their colours. Corbulo had posted his cohorts in convenient places, under the command of Pactius Orphitus, whom he warned not to engage the enemy under any pretence whatsoever, but to keep within his trenches, and wait for greater forces ; but he, upon the arrival of some few troops of horse, who rashly demanded battle, having engaged the enemy, contrary to the general's orders, was shamefully put to flight. This event gave great concern to Corbulo, who, after having bitterly reproached Pactius, and the other commanders, expelled them all from the camp, ordered them to lie without tents or defence, and kept them under this ignominious punishment, till they were released at the intercession of the whole army.

(N) This occasioned a misunderstanding between the generals : Quadratus complained, that he had been unjustly deprived of what he had compassed by his own counsels ; and Corbulo, on the contrary, maintained, that the king had shewn no inclination to deliver hostages, till he himself, being appointed general, had changed his hopes into fear. Nero, to put an end to their jarrings, ordered by an edict, that, for the successful conduct of Quadratus and Corbulo, the same should be annexed to their titles.

Corbulo, having thus brought his soldiers under good discipline, early in the spring invaded Armenia ; but could by no means draw Tiridates to a battle, tho' his army was superior in number to that of the Romans. Having therefore divided his forces, he ordered his several lieutenants to attack at once divers quarters ; and at the same time directed king Antiochus to fall upon that part of Armenia which bordered upon his dominions. Pharasmenes too, king of Iberia, having put to death his son Rhadamistus, and thereby freed himself from all apprehension of disturbances at home, ravaged those parts of Armenia which lay contiguous to his kingdom. The Issechians, a nation never before confederate with the Romans, being gained over by Corbulo, possessed themselves of several strong holds, and from thence infested, with continual incursions, such as adhered to the Parthians. Tiridates, being thus surrounded on all sides by enemies, dispatched ambassadors to Corbulo, to expostulate, in his own name, and that of the Parthians, upon what score it was, that, after he had so lately delivered hostages to the Romans, and renewed with them his former friendship, he must yet be driven out of Armenia, a kingdom so long enjoyed by his ancestors. He added, that his brother Vologeses had not as yet taken up arms, because they both desired to put an end to all differences by the way of accommodation, rather than by the sword ;

but if war were still to be obstinately pursued by the Romans, he hoped that the Arfacides would not find themselves forsaken by that courage and fortune, which their enemies had often tried to their cost. Corbulo, who was well informed, that not a desire of peace, but the revolt of Hyrkania was what kept Vologeses from assisting his brother in person, in his answer to this embassy, advised Tiridates to recur to the emperor, and acknowledge his sovereignty, by accepting the crown as a gift of the people of Rome, assuring him, that, by closing with the measures which he suggested, he should enjoy the kingdom of Armenia, without any disturbance from the Romans. Hereupon Tiridates proposed an interview with the Tiridates Roman general; for which the time and place being appointed, Tiridates declared, that he would come attended only by a guard of a thousand horse, but would not restrain Corbulo to any number of troops, provided they came disarmed, as a proof of their disposition to peace. From this proposal Corbulo was fully convinced, that nothing but snares could be intended; however, dissembling all his apprehensions, he returned answer, That matters which concerned the interest of both nations, would be more properly discussed in presence of both armies, and accordingly chose a place fit for drawing up his forces. On the day appointed, he advanced with his troops in battle array; but Tiridates did not appear till it was very late, and at such a distance that he could hardly be heard; so that Corbulo ordered his men to retire to their several camps; and soon afterwards, dividing them into three bodies, invaded Armenia, and reduced most of the strong holds held by Tiridates. He stormed in person the fort of Volandum, and put to the sword all that were arrived to full age, without the loss of one man. Equal success attended the other commanders, who, in one day, took three castles by storm; insomuch, that all the others voluntarily submitted. Such a series of good fortune encouraged the Roman general to attempt the siege of Artaxata; which Tiridates having in vain endeavoured to prevent, the citizens opening their gates, made an unreserved surrender; whereby their persons were saved, but the city was fired, and laid level with the ground, the walls being of such a wide circuit, that they could not be defended without a numerous garison, which Corbulo could not spare, and at the same time prosecute the war. After the demolition of Artaxata, he marched his army against Tigranocerta, which not only submitted to the conqueror, but moreover presented him with a golden crown, as a token of hospitality and friendly reception; whereupon the town was spared, spared, and the inhabitants were left in the full enjoyment of their former privileges.

Tigranes. Corbulo having thus subdued all Armenia, Tigranes was preferred by Nero to that crown. He was the son of that Alexander, who was put to death by his father Herod the Great, and of Glaphira, daughter to Archelaus king of Cappadocia. Upon the new monarch Nero bestowed a guard of a thousand legionary soldiers, three cohorts, and two wings of horse, to support him in maintaining his new kingdom. As he had lived many years at Rome in the quality of a hostage, he was intirely addicted to the Roman interest, and assumed no more power than if he had been one of their deputies. Several parts of Armenia were subjected to the neighbouring kings, Pharasmenes, Polemon, Aristobulus, and Antiochus, by way of reward for their services against Tiridates and the Parthians. Corbula, having thus settled the affairs of Armenia, withdrew into Syria, which province was assigned to him upon the death of Numidius Quadratus the late governor. In the mean time Vologeses, hearing that his brother was driven from the throne, and a stranger established king of Armenia, raised two powerful armies, one of which he sent into Armenia, under the conduct of Moneses, an experienced officer; and the other he headed in person, with a design to make an inroad into the Roman provinces; but Moneses being obliged to raise the siege of Tigranocerta, and Corbulo having in time disposed his troops along the banks of the Euphrates, so as to obstruct the enemy's march into Syria, which province Vologeses intended to invade in person, the Parthians sued for peace, and, at the threats of Corbulo, withdrew their forces from Armenia; however, Vologeses, that he might not seem to give up his claim to that kingdom, sent ambassadors to Rome, to beg it of the emperor for his brother Tiridates; but the ambassadors returning unsuccessful, Vologeses concluded a peace with the Elyrcanians, and turned all his forces against the Romans, with a design to recover Armenia, and settle his brother on that throne at any rate. Cassius Pætus, whom Nero had charged with the care of Armenia, having notice of his design, marched with two legions to the assistance of Tigranes (O); but was soon obliged to return for want of provisions. He

He took indeed a few forts, but could not hold them, the Parthians having laid waste all that part of the country. In the mean time Vologeses having raised a formidable army, took his rout towards Syria, which province he designed to invade, and thereby oblige the Romans to withdraw their troops from Armenia; but finding the banks of the Euphrates carefully guarded by Corbulo, he gave over all thoughts of making an inroad into Syria, and turned all his hopes and efforts towards Armenia. Here he besieged Pætus in his winter quarters, who, not having courage enough to hold out till the arrival of Corbulo, who was in full march to join him, desired a conference with the king. Vologeses refused to come in person, but sent Vasaces, his general of horse, to hear what Pætus had to propose. In this interview, after a long debate, it was agreed between them, that the Romans should be released from the siege; that with all their forces they should depart the territories of Armenia, and deliver up all their fortresses and stores to the Parthians, who, after a complete performance of these articles, should have free privilege to send embassadors to Rome. In the mean time Pætus laid a bridge over the river Arsanias, which flowed close to his camp, under colour of marching off that way; but it was in reality a work enjoined him by the Parthians, as a monument of their victory, for the Romans took a different rout. Before the Roman army decamped, the Armenians, in an insulting manner, entered their works, beset all the avenues, challenged and carried away whatever the Romans had got by plunder; nay, they even stripped the Romans of their cloaths, and seized their arms, the soldiers yielding whatever the enemy thought proper to take, to cut off all occasion of a quarrel. Vologeses raised a pompous heap of all the arms and bodies of the slain, as a monument of his victory; and Pætus withdrew into Cappadocia, marching forty miles a day, and every where dropping and forsaking his wounded, as if he had been close pursued by the enemy. On his return to Rome, Nero upbraided him with his shameful behaviour; but immediately added, that he freely forgave him, lest the apprehension of punishment, as he was of so fearful a temper, sular ornaments took all on a sudden a fright, and fled back. Moreover, a victim which stood by the works as they were fortifying their quarters against winter, broke violently through, leaped quite over the pales, and fled. He adds, that the soldiers javelins took fire of themselves, which seemed the more ominous, because the Parthians, whom they were marching against, used no other weapons.

should throw him into some dangerous distemper *. Vologeses, after the defeat of Pætus, sent ambassadors to Corbulo, desiring him to withdraw his several garisons from beyond the Euphrates, and let the river remain, as formerly, the common boundary to both empires. Corbulo too insisted, that all the Parthian garisons should evacuate Armenia; which the king complying with, all the fortifications raised by Corbulo on the other side of the Euphrates, were demolished. Thus, both by the king and Corbulo, the Armenians were left to their own disposal; for Tigranes died soon after the invasion of the Parthians. In the mean time, the ambassadors of Vologeses arrived at Rome, desiring that the kingdom of Armenia might be bestowed upon Tiridates, and a peace concluded between the Parthians and Romans. They expatiated on the clemency and moderation which Vologeses had shewn to Pætus and the legions, in dismissing them free and unhurt, when it was in his power to have made them all slaves, or put them to the sword; and added, that Tiridates would not refuse coming to Rome to receive there the crown, but that, as he was a Magian, the religious laws of his priesthood with-held him. He was ready, however, to address himself to the Roman ensigns and the images of Cæsar; and there, in the presence of the legions, receive the investiture of the kingdom. The ambassadors being heard, it was unanimously resolved in a council of the chief men of the city, that war should be made upon the Parthians, and the whole management thereof committed to Corbulo, who, by the experience of so many years, knew both the soldiery and the enemy. The ambassadors were therefore dismissed without obtaining their suit, but loaded with rich presents, thence to give hopes, that, were Tiridates to ask in person, he would not ask in vain. The government of Syria was committed to Sestius, and to Corbulo were granted all the forces, which were increased by the fifteenth legion, led by Marius Celsus from Pannonia. Orders were also sent to the kings and tetrarchs in the east, and to all the governors and superintendants of the neighbouring provinces, to pay intire obedience to the orders of Corbulo, who was trusted with the same extensive and unlimited authority, which the Roman people had conferred upon Pompey, in his expedition against the pirates. Corbulo having, in the beginning of the spring, drawn together all his forces, entered Armenia, took and razed some castles, and with his very name struck terror into the whole country; insomuch that Tiridates sent ambassadors to demand a cessation of arms, and to agree with him on a day and place for a conference; which being appointed, Corbulo sent one Tiberius Alexander, an illustrious Roman knight, and Vivianus Annius, his own son-in-law, to the camp of Tiridates, under colour of paying him a visit, but in reality to remove from him all apprehension of treachery or unfair dealings, which he could not well fear so long as he was possessed of such hostages<sup>d</sup>. The king and Corbulo took each twenty horse, and advanced to the place of the interview. As soon as Corbulo appeared, the king leaped from his horse, and Corbulo returning the compliment, both on foot joined their right hands. The general commended the prudence and wisdom of Tiridates for preferring peace to war, and chusing rather to compose their differences by way of treaty than by dint of arms. The king at first expatiated on the nobility and splendor of his family; but pursued the rest of his discourse with a great deal of modesty and condescension, saying, that he would travel to Rome, and there present a new subject of glory to Cæsar, a prince of the Ar-sacides his suppliant, and that at a time when the Parthians were rather victorious, than daunted by any misfortune. It was then agreed, that he should resign the royal diadem before the image of Cæsar, never to resume it more except from the hand of Nero; and thus ended the conference. A few days after the two armies met with great parade and ostentation. On one side stood the Parthian horse, ranged into troops, and distinguished by the standards of their several nations. On the other were posted the legions with their ensigns displayed, and the figures of the deified emperors represented like deities in a temple. In the centre was placed a tribunal, which supported a chair of state with Nero's image. To this Tiridates approached, and having according to custom, offered sacrifices, pulled off his crown, and laid it at the feet of the statue. The ceremony being over, Corbulo entertained the king with a sumptuous banquet, who seemed to be greatly taken with the Roman customs. The next day he desired time to visit his brothers and his mother before he undertook so long a journey; and in the mean time left his daughter as an hostage, with letters of submission to be sent to Nero. Thus he departed, and found Pacorus his younger brother in Media, and his elder brother Vologeses at Ecbatana, who, not unmindful of Tigranes's concerns, had, by a special embassy, desired of Corbulo, that his brother might bear no marks of slavery, nor be obliged to surrender his sword, nor be debarred from embracing the governors of provinces, nor stand waiting at their gates for admittance; and that in Rome the same honour should be paid him as was paid to the consuls<sup>e</sup>. He was received at Rome by Nero with the utmost magnificence, and entertained during his stay in that city, at the expence of above six thousand pounds a day. On the day appointed for his inauguration, the emperor appeared at the rostra, sitting in a curule chair, attired with a triumphal habit, and surrounded by his guards and the cohorts, with their ensigns displayed, and their colours flying. Tiridates approaching his chair, fell down at his feet; but the emperor immediately raised him with his right hand, and honoured him with a kiss. Then Tiridates pronounced his speech, wherein he begged Nero to bestow upon him the kingdom of Armenia, which he should always acknowledge as a gift of Rome. Having ended his speech, which was interpreted to the vast crowd of spectators by a Roman of the pretorian rank, and pulled off his tiara, Nero, with his own hand, placed the diadem on his head. From the rostra they proceeded to the theatre, where the emperor placed Tiridates, after he had renewed his supplication, on his right hand. After he had been for some time entertained in Rome at an incredible expence, Nero dismissed him, and on his departure, presented him with a sum to the amount of near eight hundred thousand pounds to defray the expences of his journey<sup>f</sup>. He not only allowed him to rebuild the city of Artaxata, which Corbulo had demolished; but moreover ordered such Roman builders and artificers, as the king desired, to attend him into Armenia. By the direction and assistance of these he restored that city to its former splendor, and by way of acknowledgment called it Neronia, from the name of his benefactor. He was ever after faithful to the Romans, who assisted him in recovering great part of his kingdom taken from him by the Albani, who, after having over-run Media and driven his brother Pacorus from that throne, had with a mighty army invaded Armenia. Tiridates met them on the frontiers, and having ventured a battle, his army was routed and himself narrowly escaped being taken prisoner. He reigned nine years after his return from Rome, and was succeeded by several kings, who held the crown as vassals of the Roman empire, being either appointed or confirmed by the emperors. In this state Armenia continued till Trajan's time, who, adding Mesopotamia to his dominions, reduced the antient kingdom of Armenia to the form of a province, and made the Tigris the eastern boundary of the empire, which Augustus had thought fit to extend no farther than the banks of the Euphrates; but it soon recovered its liberty, and was again governed by its own kings in the reign of Constantine the Great and his successors, to whom the kings of Armenia were feudatories. In the reign of Justinian II. the Saracens subdued, and held it till the irruption of the Turks, who possessed themselves of this kingdom, and gave it the name of Turcomania. The Turks, after the reduction of Armenia, invaded Persia, and other countries subject to the emperors of the east, which gave the Armenians an opportunity of shaking off the Turkish yoke, and setting up kings of their own, by whom they were governed till the country was again subdued by Occadan, or, as some style him, Heccata, the son of Cingis, and first cham of the Tartars. Neither was the conquest of Armenia by the Tartars so absolute as to extirpate the race of their kings; seeing we read of Haithon, surnamed the Armenian, reigning some time after, and going in person to treat with Mongo the great cham of Tartary, of the concerns of his kingdom; and in our own chronicles we find mention made of Leo king of Armenia, who, in the reign of Richard II. came into England to sue for aid against the Turks, by whom he had been driven from his kingdom. In the year 1472 of the christian æra, Ussan Cassanes king of Armenia, succeeding to the crown of Persia, made Armenia a province of that empire; in which state it continued till the year 1522, when it was subdued by Selim II. and made a province of the Turkish empire. Some say, that Selim I. reduced it on his return from Persia, where he had gained a complete victory over the great sophi Ismael. But Sansovin assures us, that in the reign of Selim I. who died in 1520, both the Lesser and Greater Armenia had their own kings; and adds, that Selim caused the head of the king of the Lesser Armenia to be cut off and sent to Venice, as a mark of his victory. We read no where else of any kings of Armenia after it became a province of Persia. Be that as it will, the Turkish annals cited by Calvisius inform us, that Selim II. conquered Armenia in 1522, since which time it has ever continued subject to the Turks, except the eastern part, which the Persians are masters of to this day.

S E C T. III.

The history of ARMENIA MINOR.

ARMENIA Minor was bounded on the east by the Euphrates, parting it from Armenia Major; on the south by mount Taurus, separating it from Cilicia; on the west and north by a long chain of mountains, called in different places Mons Scordiscus, Amanus, and Antitaurus. By these mountains it is divided from Cappadocia. It is a very mountainous country; but the mountains are here and there interspersed with pleasant and fruitful vales, abounding with oil and wine no-ways inferior to the best of Greece. This country was a part of Cappadocia till the reign of Antiochus the Great, when Zadriades and Artaxias, seizing on Armenia and adding it to some of the neighbouring provinces, introduced the distinction of Armenia the Greater and Lesser. In the time of the Romans it was divided into these four provinces, Laviana, Muriana, Aravena, and Melitene, each of which had their several cities, all mentioned by Ptolemy; but those of chiefest note were, Melitene, situate in the province of that name, and the metropolis of Armenia Minor. It was afterwards called Malaxia, and now Suur. It is said by Onuphrius to be a colony of the Romans; and is celebrated by Eusebius and other ecclesiastic writers for the piety of the christian inhabitants during the time of persecution. Nicopolis, built by Pompey in memory of a signal victory obtained over Tigranes the Great, whence it is styled Nicopolis Pompeii. Garnace, a strong and well-fortified town, mentioned by Tacitus, and called Gorneas. Aza, placed by Pliny in Armenia, but by Ptolemy in Pontus. Arabyssus, Dasusa, Zimara, Ladana, and many others mentioned by Ptolemy, of which we know nothing but the mere names. As to the manners, customs, religion, &c. of the inhabitants of Armenia Minor, they were much the same with those of the inhabitants of Armenia Major, of which we have already taken notice.

Minor.
Zadriades*

THE first that reigned in Armenia Minor was Zadriades, who, together with Artaxias, revolting from Antiochus the Great, seized on that part of his kingdom which was afterwards called Armenia Minor, as we have mentioned above. He entered into an alliance with the Romans, by whom he was maintained on the throne which he had usurped. His posterity posterity held the kingdom of Armenia till the reign of Tigranes I. king of the Greater Armenia, by whom Artanes, Artanes. the last king of the Zadriadan race, was slain in battle. We find no mention of the intermediate kings, whence we may conclude, that they performed nothing worth mentioning. Tigranes having killed Artanes, and routed his army, possessed himself of Armenia Minor; but was soon driven out by Pompey, who bestowed it upon Dejotarus, king, or rather Dejotarus. tetrarch, of Galatia, for his remarkable affection to the people of Rome, and eminent services during the Mithridatic war, in which he obtained a complete victory over that king's generals. To Armenia Minor the same Pompey added great part of Pontus, and a large portion of Colchis, with some provinces of Galatia, which till his time had been subject to other princes. Dejotarus lived in great intimacy with Sylla, Lucullus, Pompey, Murena, Cato, Cicero, and Brutus, and was by the senate honoured with the title of friend and ally of the people of Rome, for whose interest he shewed on all occasions such zeal, that Pompey used to say, Of all the friends of Rome Dejotarus was the most hearty, of all their allies the most sincere, and the only one on whom they could entirely rely<sup>g</sup>. He proved very serviceable to Cicero in the Cilician war, his troops being trained up after the Roman discipline. In the civil war he sided with Pompey, and distinguished himself in the battle of Pharsalia. During his absence Pharnaces king of Pontus, revolting from the Romans, invaded Armenia Minor, and having obtained a complete victory over the joint forces of Dejotarus and Domitius Calvinus, Julius Cæsar's lieutenant in Asia, got intire possession of that kingdom<sup>h</sup>; but he was soon driven out by Cæsar, who restored Armenia to Dejotarus, whom he pardoned at the request of Brutus, obliging him to relinquish the tetrarchy of Galatia, and pay a large sum of money for joining Pompey in the civil war. Some writers say, that Cæsar restored the kingdom not to him, but to his son. Be that as it will, he retained the title of king, and either alone, or together with his son, governed the kingdom of Armenia. He was afterwards accused at Rome by Cæsar's daughter's son, as if he and his son had plotted against Cæsar, with a design to murder him during his stay in the tetrarchy of Galatia; but was cleared from that charge by Cicero, who, on this occasion, made the oration which is still extant, and pronounced it in Cæsar's house at Rome. Dejotarus revenged this calumny with the death of his daughter and her husband, and caused the castle where they resided to be levelled with the ground<sup>1</sup>. After Cæsar's death he recovered whatever he had forfeited for siding with Pompey, having by a bribe of one hundred thousand sesterces gained Fulvia, Marc Antony's wife, who caused an edict to be fixed in the capitol, wherein all things were feigned to have been restored to him by Cæsar himself<sup>k</sup>. New troubles arising at Rome upon the death of Cæsar, Dejotarus sent a body of troops to join Brutus; but Amyntas, who commanded them, went straight to Antony's camp, as it he had been enjoined by Dejotarus to assist Antony, and not Brutus; whereupon, after the defeat of Brutus, Dejotarus was allowed to hold Armenia; and the tetrarchy of Galatia, after his death, was bestowed upon Amyntas. Dejotarus reigned to a very great age, and, as some say, outlived his son Dejotarus, whom Cæsar appointed king during his father's life-time.

Dejotarus
II.

Dejotarus II. reigned together with his father, and was no less addicted to the Romans than he, having been brought up by Cato, as Plutarch informs us<sup>l</sup>. Cicero deemed him one of the best friends he had in the world, and even trusted his two sons to his care during the Cilician war<sup>m</sup>. At his instigation Dejotarus joined Cassius in the civil war that broke out upon the death of Cæsar; but died before the domestic troubles of the republic were settled. As he left no issue, that part of Galatia which he held was bestowed upon Amyntas and Castor his sister's son. The family of Dejotarus being extinct, the kingdom of Armenia Minor was first given to Artuafdes king of Media, and afterwards by Marc Antony to Polemon king of Pontus. Polemon was succeeded by Arche-laüs the Cappadocian, and he by Cetys of Bosphorus. Nero bestowed this kingdom on Aristobulus, great-grandson to Herod the Great, upon whose death it fell to Tigranes his near relation, who dying without issue, Armenia Minor was by Vespasian made a province of the Roman empire, and continued so till the division of the empire, when it was subjected to the emperors of the east; and, on the decline of their power, subdued first by the Persians, and afterwards by the Turks, who gave it the name of Genech, and have held it ever since.

S E C T. I.

The description of PONTUS.

SOME derive the name of this country from the neighbouring sea, commonly called by the Latins Pontus Euxinus, or the Euxine sea; others from an antient king named Pontus, who imparted his name both to the country and the sea on which it lies. But Bochart<sup>n</sup> makes it come from the Phœnician word botno, signifying a filbert, as if that kind of nut remarkably abounded here. The word botno, by transposing, changing, and adding of letters, he transforms into Pontos, in the same manner that he might have derived it from a thousand other words, bearing perhaps a nearer similitude to it in sound, which, in many etymologies, seems to be his chief, if not only rule. The country, adds he, gave its name to the neighbouring sea, and, in process of time, the appellation, which was peculiar to one, became common to all seas; but the common opinion, viz. that the country borrowed its name from the sea, seems by far the most probable. That sea was called by way of excellency the pontus, or the sea, being the greatest that was known to the antient inhabitants of that country; whence not only that tract which we are now speaking of, but the whole country extending along the coast, was formerly, as Strabo informs us, called Pontus. Name.

THE proper Pontus, as precisely as we can gather, lies between the forty first and forty third degrees of north latitude, and was bounded by the Euxine sea on the north, by Armenia Minor on the south, by Colchis on the east, and by the river Halys on the west. This country is divided by Ptolemy into three parts, viz. Pontus Galaticus, Pontus Polemoniacus, and

Pontus Cappadocius. Pontus Galaticus, so named because added to Galatia in the time of the Romans, extended from the Halys to the river Thermodon. The chief cities in this tract were, Amisus, built by the Milesians, and peopled partly by them, and partly by a colony from Athens. It was at first a free city, like the other Greek cities in Asia; but afterwards subdued by Pharnaces king of Pontus, and made the metropolis of his kingdom. It was taken by Lucullus in the Mithridatic war, and restored to its antient liberty. Eupatoria, close to Amisus, so called from Mithridates Eupator its founder. This city was likewise taken by Lucullus, and levelled with the ground; but afterwards rebuilt by Pompey, who made it one city with Amisus, and gave it the name of Pompeopolis. It was taken, during the war between Cæsar and Pompey, by Pharnaces king of Pontus, who put most part of the inhabitants to the sword; but Cæsar, having conquered Pharnaces, made it again a free city. Amasia, seated among mountains at three miles distance from the river Iris, now Casalmach; from whence there is a trench, as Tavernier informs us, cut out of a hard rock, to convey water to the town. It is still a large place, the capital of this country, and the seat of the governor or beglerbeg. The river which, about sixty miles below, falls into the Euxine sea, is so large, that ships of burden can come up to the town. It is so defended by craggy mountains, that it is inaccessible, except on one side. It has been customary for the eldest son of the Grandsignior to reside here till he is called to the throne. This city was antiently the seat of the kings of Cappadocia, and some marks of its former grandeur still appear in the ruins of very magnificent buildings. It gave birth to Strabo the geographer, and, in Christian times, was the see of an archbishop. Themiscyra, now Fanagoria, seated on a spacious plain on the sea-coast, sixty miles north-east of Amasia, antiently giving name to the adjoining province; and a city of no small note, being always numbered among the chief towns of this district; but at present a beggarly village. Cabira, memorable for the defeat of Mithridates by Lucullus, and afterwards called Diospolis. Comana, called Pontica, to distinguish it from two other cities bearing the same name, the one in Cappadocia, and the other in Pisidia. It was seated on the south borders of this province, about seventy miles from Themiscyra, and eighty from Amasia, and in antient times the second city of Pontus Galaticus; but now very inconsiderable.

Pontus Polemoniacus, so called by the Romans from Polemon king of this country, on whose death it fell to them, extended

ed from the river Thermodon to the country of the Chalybes, or Pontus Cappadocius. The most considerable cities of this province are, Neocæsarea, the metropolis after it became a Roman province, and in former times a city of great renown. Sebastia, so called from Augustus, whom the Greeks stiled Sebastos. This was one of the first cities of Asia that made head against Tamerlan, in revenge whereof he caused twelve thousand of the inhabitants to be buried alive in pits dug for that purpose. Not far from this city is mount Stella, famous in the Roman history for the final overthrow of Mitbridates by Pompey. On the same spot, as some writers inform us, Tamerlan, with an army of eight hundred thousand Tartars, encountered Bajazet marching to the relief of Sebastia with an army of five hundred thousand Turks, cut two hundred thousand of his men in pieces, and took Bajazet himself prisoner. Zela, seated near the river Lycus, and famous for the defeat of Triarius by Cæsar. This city was enlarged by Pompey, and called Megalopolis. Constantine the Great added it to the province of Helenopontus. Polemonium, a famous town and harbour built by Polemon, whom Marc Antony created king of that country. From this town, if we believe Ptolemy, Pontus Polemoniacus had its name. This country is watered by the river Thermodon, and is supposed to have been the kingdom of the Amazons, who admitted no men among them, and yet were famous for warlike exploits. They are said, or rather feigned, to have been originally the wives of those Scythians, who, in the reign of Sesostris king of Egypt, broke into Asia. A party of these Scythians is said to have invaded this part of Pontus, under the conduct of Plinus and Scalopythus, two young men of a great family, who had been driven out of their own country by a contrary faction. They ruled this country for many years; but at last both they and their army being all to a man treacherously murdered, their wives, under the command of Lampedo and Marpesia, fell upon the conquerors, and not only overthrew them, but subdued the neighbouring nations, and erected a female monarchy, which they enjoyed for some ages. The names of their queens that occur in history, are, Lampedo, Marpesia, Ortara, Antiopa, whose sisters, Hippolite and Menalyppe, are feigned to have challenged Hercules and Theseus to single combat, and to have been conquered by them with great difficulty. Penthesilea, who came with a body of brave heroines to aid Priam king of Troy, and was slain by Pyrrhus son to Achilles; she is said to have invented the battle-ax. Thalestris, who, as Justin and others inform us, came to visit Alexander the Great, while he was in Hyrcania, and plainly told him, that her errand was no other than to have a child by so great a hero. These warlike women suffered no man to live among them; if they brought forth any male children by the conversation they had twice a year with the men of the neighbouring countries, they either killed them, or sent them to their fathers; but the females they bred up to the use of arms. They are said to have extended their empire as far as Ephesus; but coming into Europe, they were defeated by the Athenians, under the conduct of Theseus, and driven back. But the whole story of the Amazons is deservedly looked upon as a mere fable, which perhaps had its rise from the custom which prevailed among the Scythian women, of accompanying their husbands in their wars.

Pontus Cappadocius, so called because it bordered on Cappadocia, and was added to that province by the Romans, extended from Pontus Polemoniacus to Colchis, having Armenia Minor, and the upper stream of the Euphrates for its southern bounds. The chief cities of this tract were, Cerasus built by the inhabitants of Sinope in Paphlagonia, to whom it paid, as Xenophon observes, a yearly tribute. From this town Lucullus first brought cherries into Italy, called therefore by the Latins Cerasa. Tournefort tells us, that the country here is very hilly, and that the hills are covered with woods, wherein cherry-trees grow naturally. Tertullian ironically expostulates with the Gentiles for not making Lucullus on this consideration a god, seeing they had bestowed divine honours on Bacchus, for transplanting the vine into the western countries. Cerasus, according to Arrian, was afterwards named Pharnacia; but Strabo and Ptolemy speak of Cerasus and Pharnacia as two distinct towns. It is still a pretty large town known by the name of Cerasonte, and seated on the sea-coast at the foot of a little hill between two very steep rocks, with a ruinous castle built by the emperors of Trebisond on the top of the rock, which is to the right as you enter the harbour. Tripoli, mentioned by Arrian and Pliny about three miles from the coast, but now reduced to a poor village. Trapezus or Trebisond, called now Tarabosan, a Greek city, having been founded by the inhabitants of Sinope, to whom it even paid tribute, as we are informed by Xenophon, who passed by Trebisond when he led back the remains of the ten thousand. It was situated on the sea-coast in a peninsula, and surrounded by steep mountains. The ancients speak of it as a city of great note. After the overthrow of Mithridates, who had seized it, the Romans restored it, as they did most of the Greek cities in Asia, to its former liberty and privileges. This city became famous in the middle ages for the court of the Greek emperors of the family of the Comneni, who resided here after the Latins had made themselves masters of Constantinople under the conduct of Baldwin earl of Flanders. Alexis Comnenes was the first who reigned here with the title of emperor, though Vincent de Beauvais gives him only the title of lord of Trebisond. He began his reign in 1204. and David Comnenes, the eleventh in succession, was overcome, and cruelly murdered with his seven sons, by Mohammed the Great in 1461, when Trebisond was taken by the Turks, and Pontus, Paphlagonia, and Cappadocia, which the emperors of Trebisond had held, submitted to the conqueror. It is still a very considerable city, and a place of great resort for the trade to Constantinople, Caffa, and other places on the Pontus, or Black-sea. It contains twenty thousand inhabitants, but having suffered a great deal in wars, especially in 1617, when it was burnt by the Russians, the buildings are very inconsiderable. The castle is pretty large, and built on a rock, out of which the ditches, that surround it, are cut. The inscription that is on the gate of the castle shews that the emperor Justinian repaired the edifices of the city. It is strange that Procopius should not mention this, seeing he employs three entire books in describing even the most inconsiderable buildings erected by that prince in every corner of his empire. That historian barely tells us, that Justinian caused an aqueduct to be built at Trebisond, and called it the aqueduct of S. Eugenius the martyr. The port of Trebisond, called Platena, is to the east of the town. The emperor Adrian caused it to be repaired, as we are informed by Arrian. The harbour which the Genoese are said to have made there is almost destroyed. This town was in former ages a place of great trade, as appears from several medals produced by Tournefort.

THE chief rivers of Pontus are, the Halys, which rising in the greater Cappadocia, divides Pontus from Paphlagonia, and not far from Amisus discharges itself into the Euxine sea. It flows towards the west, and then bends to the north, as Strabo describes it; but all our modern geographers make it come from the east, following therein Herodotus, whose mistake was long ago taken notice of, and corrected by Arrian, who surveyed these places by order of the emperor Adrian. It took its name, as Strabo informs us, from the salt-pits, in which great part of the country abounds through which it flows. The Iris, now Casalmac, which has its rise in Pontus, and, receiving into its channel the Lycus, and the small river of Themiscyra falls into the Euxine sea not far from the Halys. The Thermodon, a river famous among the antients for watering the little empire of the Amazons. It had its rise near the small city of Phanaræa in Pontus Polemoniacus, and discharged itself, like the other rivers of Pontus, into the Euxine sea.

Soil and climate.

THE air of this country is reckoned very wholesome, and the soil in many places fruitful; the hills are for the most part covered with olive or cherry-trees, and the plains abound with all sorts of grain, being plentifully watered with small rivers. The honey of this country is of a very particular nature; the effect it had on the army of the ten thousand is related by Xenophon: “As there were a great many bee-hives in the neighbourhood of Trapezus or Trebisond, says this author, our soldiers having eat greedily of it, were taken with violent evacuations upwards and downwards, attended with deliriums: such as were the least affected seemed to be drunk, and the others to have run quite distracted: the ground was strewn with bodies as after a battle; none, however, died of it, and the distemper ceased the next day about the same hour that it began. Aristotle was of opinion, that the bees gathered this honey from the box-trees, and adds, that it deprived those of their senses who were in health before eating it; and, on the contrary, cured such as were already mad. Pliny speaks of it thus: “In some years the honey is very dangerous about Heraclæa in Pontus; authors know not from what flowers the bees extract it. Here is what we have been able to learn of this matter: there is a plant in those parts called Ægolethron, whose leaves in a wet spring imbibe a very dangerous quality: the honey which the bees extract from them is more liquid than usual, more heavy and redder; its smell causes sneezing; those who eat of it, lie on the ground, sweat violently, and care for nothing but coolers. There is also found, on the same coast of the Pontus, another sort of honey called Mænomenon, because it makes those run mad who eat of it. ’Tis thought the bees collect it from the flower of the Rhododendros, which the forests there abound with. The people of those parts, tho’ they pay the Romans part of their tribute in wax, are very cautious how they offer them their honey.”

Their origin, arts, sciences,
&c.

It is commonly believed, that the antient inhabitants of this country were the descendants of Tubal, but in process of time mixed with Cappadocians, Paphlagonians, and other foreign nations, not to mention the many Greek colonies which settled in these parts, and maintained themselves free till the time of the latter kings of Pontus, when most of them were reduced by Mithridates the Great, and Pharnaces. As for their arts and manufactures, all we know is, that the inhabitants of

Pontus

Pontus Cappadocius called Chalybes, are celebrated by the antients for their extraordinary skill in working of iron, and making of steel armour; whence they are said to have had their name; and truly they seem to have excelled much more in the labours of the hand, than in those of the head. They were very likely a trading people; having many convenient havens on the Euxine sea, and great store of timber proper for building of ships growing on the coast. Their language and religion were much the same with those of Cappadocia, of which hereafter. Their chief deities were, Ceres, Jupiter, and Neptune, to whom they offered burnt-sacrifices, pouring on the fire, honey, milk, oil and wine. In honour of Neptune, they used to drive into the sea chariots drawn by four white horses, which they drowned.

THIS country was originally a part of Cappadocia, extending from mount Taurus to the Euxine sea, and divided Government.
into several petty kingdoms, which, if we believe Diodorus, were first subdued by Ninus. The Medes and Persians were in their turns masters of this and all the countries bordering on the Euxine sea. The latter divided Cappadocia into two satrapies or governments; and bestowed that part or satrapy, which was afterwards by the Macedonians named Pontus, on one of the ancestors of Mithridates; as Justin informs us. This happened, as it is commonly believed, in the reign of Darius the son of Hystaspes, who conferred this new kingdom on one Artabazus of the royal family of Persia; so that Pontus, which to that time had been but a province of Cappadocia, began to be ruled by its own kings, and be a separate kingdom in the reign of Darius Hystaspes. However, they paid tribute to the Persians, and were in a manner their vassals till the reign of Ariobarzanes, who shook off the Persian yoke and greatly enlarged his small kingdom. In process of time the kings of Pontus became very considerable, having added to their dominions all Cappadocia, Paphlagonia, and great part of Bithynia to the west, and of Colchis to the south; insomuch, that Mithridates VII. surnamed Eupator, is looked upon as one of the most powerful princes that ever reigned in the east, having held out for forty years together against the Romans, though their armies were commanded by the greatest generals which Rome ever produced, namely by Sylla, Lucullus, and Pompey. The kingdom of Pontus was governed by princes descended from Achæmenes of the royal family of Persia, till the death of Darius, son to Pharnaces II. in whom the Achæmenian family ended. Upon the death of Darius, which happened soon after the battle of Philippi, the kingdom of Pontus was bestowed by the Romans on Zeno, who was succeeded by his son Polemon I. and he by his son Polemon II. upon whose death the family of Zeno being extinct, the kingdom of Pontus was made a Roman province in the reign of the emperor Claudius.

Artabazes.

THE first king of Pontus, we find mentioned in history, is Artabazes, whom Darius the son of Hystaspes preferred to that crown<sup>o</sup>. Some writers tell us, that he was one of the seven competitors to the kingdom of Persia upon the death of Gambyfes; and others, that he was descended from one of them, which seems more probable, seeing he is not named among them by Herodotus.

Rhodobates.

Rhodobates appears next; he is mentioned by Laertius<sup>p</sup>, and said to have reigned in the time of Darius Nothus; whence it is plain, that he did not succeed Artabazes, who was contemporary with Darius Hystaspes, between whose reign and that of Darius II. surnamed Nothus, chronologers count above eighty years.

Mithridates I.

Rhodobates was succeeded by Mithridates I. who refusing to pay the usual tribute to Artaxerxes Mnemon king of Persia, was by him overcome in battle; but a peace was soon after concluded between them by the mediation of Tissaphernes. He entered into an alliance with Clearchus, afterwards tyrant of Heraclea, by whom he was betrayed and taken prisoner. For Clearchus having promised to deliver the city of Heraclea into his hands, Mithridates no sooner entered the town, but he and those that attended him were surrounded and disarmed. The king was detained prisoner till such time as he paid a large sum for his ransom, and then dismissed<sup>q</sup>. This is all we read of him in history. Xenophon gives him only the title of governor of Cappadocia.

Ariobarzanes.

Mithridates was succeeded by Ariobarzanes, who, being appointed by Artaxerxes governor of Lydia, Ionia, and Phrygia, employed the forces that were under his command against his prince, and not only invaded the kingdom of Pontus, but added to it great part of the neighbouring provinces, which to that time had been subject to the Persians. Autophradates, sent by Artaxerxes to dispossess him of the provinces which he had seized, laid siege to Assos, and at the same time Cotys king of Paphlagonia sat down before Sestus; but were both obliged to withdraw by Agésilas and Timotheus the Athenian, whom Ariobarzanes had with great promises invited to his assistance. The king, being by their timely arrival delivered from the dangers that threatened him, rewarded Agésilas with a great sum of money, and bestowed on Timotheus the cities of Erithon and Sestus, which he had not long before taken from the Persians. He used his utmost endeavours, as Demosthenes informs us, to reconcile the Lacedæmonians and Thebans; but not being able to bring the Thebans to any reasonable terms, he assisted the Lacedæmonians with immense sums of money. The Athenians, as the same author acquaints us<sup>r</sup>, shewed such an esteem for this prince, that they not only made him free of their city, but granted both him and his children whatever they asked of them. He was murdered, as we read in Aristotle<sup>s</sup>, in the twenty eighth year of his reign by one Mithridates, whom some take to be his son. As the death of Ariobarzanes happened at the time that Alexander the Great invaded Persia, the kingdom of Pontus was seized on by the Macedonians, but recovered by Mithridates II. son to Ariobarzanes, in the reign of Antigon-Mithridatus, to whose share that country fell. This event is related thus by Polybius<sup>t</sup>, Florus<sup>u</sup>, Aurelius Victor<sup>w</sup>, and others: Antigon having dreamt that he had a field in which gold grew after the manner of corn, and that Mithridates cut it down and carried it into Pontus, began to entertain no small jealousy against him, and even gave private orders for the apprehending of him, with a design to put him to death. But Mithridates, having received from Demetrius timely notice of the king's intention, withdrew into Paphlagonia, attended only by six horsemen. Here, with the assistance of many others that joined him, he possessed himself of Ciniatum, a strong hold situated near mount Olgasys, and from thence, his army growing daily stronger, made an irruption into Cappadocia, and having driven the commanders of Antigonus from that part which borders on Pontus, he entered in triumph his paternal kingdom, which in spite of all the efforts of Antigonus he held for the space of twenty six years, and transmitted to his posterity. During his father's life-time he was highly in favour with Artaxerxes Mnemon, having, to gratify that prince, treacherously murdered Datames, governor of Cappadocia, who opposed his designs upon that country. He is said to have lived to the age of eighty four years *. Diodorus tells us, that he was put to death by Antigonus for siding with Cassander; he was succeeded by his son

Mithridates III. who added to the kingdom of Pontus all Cappadocia, and Paphlagonia, as Diodorus informs us †. He entered into an alliance with the inhabitants of Heraclea, after several unsuccessful attempts upon that city. He reigned thirty six years.

Ariobarzanes II. Mithridates III. was succeeded by his son Ariobarzanes II. who made war upon the Galatians; but with what success, we know not.

Mithridates IV. Mithridates IV. came to the crown on the death of his father Ariobarzanes; as he was then very young, the Galatians invaded his kingdom, and were attended with success; but all on a sudden turned their forces against the free city of Heraclea; but not being able to master it, they returned home, and suffered Mithridates to recover and peaceably enjoy what they had seized.

Mithridates V. Mithridates V. who succeeded his father Mithridates IV. made war upon the inhabitants of Sinope, a Greek city upon the coast of Paphlagonia; he made himself master of all the adjoining places; but finding the whole peninsula, on which Sinope itself stood, well fortified, and garrisoned, not only by the inhabitants, but also by their allies the Rhodians, he gave over the enterprize *. He afterwards proved a great friend to the Rhodians, and assisted them with money to repair the losses they had suffered by an earthquake. He entered into a strict alliance with Antiochus the Great, who married one of his daughters, named Laodice.

Pharnaces I. His son Pharnaces I. falling unexpectedly on the city of Sinope, took it by storm; whereupon the Rhodians sent ambassadors to Rome to complain of the violent proceedings of the king of Pontus against their allies; but Pharnaces was so far from being intimidated at the threats of the Romans, that on the contrary he invaded the territories of Eumenes king of Pergamus, a great friend and ally of the republic. Eumenes likewise dispatched ambassadors to Rome to complain of Pharnaces, and in the mean time entering into an alliance with Ariarathes, king of Cappadocia, secured his dominions against any attempts of the enemy. Pharnaces finding himself thus disappointed, and not caring to engage in a war with the Romans, sent deputies to Rome to complain of Eumenes and Ariarathes, as if they had been the aggressors. Hereupon Marcus and other Roman citizens of great integrity were sent into Asia as umpires between the contending parties, and charged to compose, if possible, all differences in an amicable manner. Marcus found Eumenes and Ariarathes encamped with a considerable army in the plains of Amisus, but ready to lay down arms, and refer the whole matter to arbitration; whereupon he enjoined them to withdraw their forces from the enemy's country, which they did accordingly, ordering their troops the very next morning to march back into Galatia. But Pharnaces could by no means be prevailed upon to come to an interview with Eumenes, or assist at any conference where he should be present; with much ado they persuaded him to send ambassadors with full power to treat of such matters as concerned both nations, and to agree to such articles as the arbitrators should judge equitable. The conference being opened, those, who were sent by Pharnaces, started so many difficulties, that nothing could be settled; wherefore Marcus, plainly perceiving that Pharnaces had no mind to come to an agreement, broke off the conference, and returned to Rome. Upon his departure Eumenes took the field again, and Pharnaces on his side sent Leocritus, his commander in chief, at the head of ten thousand men, to lay waste Galatia, at that time subject to Eumenes. Leocritus on his march besieged the city of Teios, or, as some call it, Pius, and having obliged the garison, which entirely consisted of mercenaries, to capitulate, he promised to convey them with their arms and effects to what place they should chuse; but having soon after their departure received express orders from Pharnaces to put them all to the sword, he pursued them, and slew them all to a man. In this war Pharnaces depended upon the assistance of Seleucus king of Syria, who was already come as far as mount Taurus, in order to join him; but being reminded by the Roman ambassadors of the articles stipulated between his father Antiochus and the republic; he thought fit to march back, and leave Pharnaces to shift for himself<sup>7</sup>. The king of Pontus finding himself thus disappointed, and at the same time his dominions invaded by the confederate kings of Per-gamus and Cappadocia supported by the Romans, condescended at last to sue for peace, which was granted him upon the following conditions: that he should forthwith withdraw his forces from Galatia, and disannul all engagements and alliances with the inhabitants of that country; that he should in like manner evacuate Paphlagonia, and send back to their respective homes with all their effects such as he had carried thence into slavery; that he should restore to Ariarathes all the places which he had taken during the war, the hostages of both kings, all their prisoners without ransom; and moreover deliver up to them such of their subjects; as from the first breaking out of the war had fled to him; that he should return to Morzas, a petty king in those parts, and to Ariarathes the nine hundred talents, which he had seized in the war, and pay down three hundred more to Eumenes, as a fine for invading his dominions without any provocation. Mithridates king of Armenia, having in this war joined Pharnaces, was by the articles of agreement obliged to pay three hundred talents to Ariarathes for having assisted his enemy, contrary to a treaty of peace and alliance at that time subsisting between them. In this treaty were comprized Artaxias king of Armenia, Gatalus king of Sarmatia, Acusilochus another petty king, and the free cities of Heraclea, Mesembrya, Chersonesus, and Cyzicus<sup>2</sup>. The city of Sinope remained to Pharnaces, and was held by his successors till the time of the Mithridatic war, when it was restored by Lucullus to its former liberty. The hostages for the performance of these articles were no sooner delivered, but the confederate kings disbanded their armies, and retired home. Pharnaces died soon after, and left to his son Mithridates the kingdom of Pontus, more weakened by this peace than by all his wars. Pliny tells us<sup>b</sup>, that the herb centory had its name in Greek from this king, who is supposed to have applied himself to the study of botanics.

Mithridates VI.

Mithridates VI. was the first king of Pontus that entered into an alliance with the Romans, sending them a considerable supply of ships in their third war with the Carthaginians<sup>c</sup>. He likewise proved a faithful ally to them in the war which they carried on, at first with great loss, against Aristo- nicus, who upon the death of Attalus laid claim to the kingdom of Pergamus. After the defeat of P. Crassus most of the princes of Asia either sided with Aristonicus, or retired home; but Mithridates could by no offers or promises be prevailed upon to abandon the cause he had once espoused; on which consideration he was rewarded by the senate with Phrygia Major, and honoured with the title of friend and ally of the people of Rome<sup>d</sup>. Appian tells us that Phrygia was bestowed on him, not by the senate, but by Manius Aquilius, who succeeded M. Perperna in the command of the Roman forces in Asia, being bribed thereunto by the king with a large sum of money<sup>e</sup>. Be that as it will, it is certain, that the senate took Phrygia away from his son, during his minority, and declared it a free and independent state, as he himself complains in his speech related by Trogus<sup>f</sup>. Mithridates after a long and prosperous reign was treacherously murdered by some of his intimate acquaintance. He left two sons, of which the elder named also Mithridates, succeeding him in the kingdom of Pontus, eclipsed all those who had reigned before him, and is generally counted one of the greatest princes that ever swayed a sceptre. He maintained a most bloody war with the Romans for the space of forty six years, and alone gave them more trouble, as their own writers witness, than Pyrrhus, Hannibal, and the powerful kings of Syria and Macedon had done altogether. He received many dreadful overthrows, his armies were often cut in pieces, his strong holds taken and levelled with the ground, and his whole kingdom laid waste; but still he returned more formidable than ever, as if he had received new strength from his very losses; and at last in spite of all the efforts of his powerful adversaries, died a voluntary death in his own kingdom, which he transmitted to his posterity. We shall give here a short, but distinct account of his war with the Romans, commonly called the Mithridatic war, it being one of the greatest and most expensive that the republic ever waged.

Mithridates VII. surnamed the Great, was according to Mithridates Strabo, eleven years old; according to Eutropius, twelve; and according to Memnon, thirteen, when he came to the throne. His future greatness was foretold, if Trogus may be credited<sup>g</sup>, by two comets, one of which appeared at his birth, and the other the first year of his reign. Both these comets were seen for seventy days and seventy nights together; their splendor was such as to eclipse the sun, and raise in people's minds the dread of a final conflagration. They covered the fourth part of the heaven, and in rising or setting took up the space of four hours (P).

Mithridates began his reign with most inhuman and unnatural acts of cruelty practised on his mother and nearest relations. His father by his last will appointed him and his mother joint heirs to the kingdom; but he claiming the whole, threw his mother into prison, where he kept her under close confinement, till through hard usage she ended her days<sup>h</sup>. Servius says, that he poisoned her, that he might being then but a child lie under no check<sup>i</sup>. Those, to whom the care of his education was committed, observing him to be of a cruel and unruly temper, made various attempts on his life, but could never compass their design, he being always on his guard, and armed, even in so tender an age, against all manner of treachery, without ever shewing the least diffidence (Q).

(P) That which appeared at his birth must be the comet which Seneca mentions in the following words (16): “In the reign of king Attalus there appeared a comet, which being small at first, afterwards spread itself as far as the equinoctial circle, so that its extent equalled that region of the heaven which we call the milky way.” If this comet appeared, as Seneca affirms, in the reign of Attalus, we must allow Mithridates, with Eutropius (17), and Orosius (18), who usually follow Livy, seventy two years of life; for had he lived only sixty eight or sixty nine, as Appian insinuates (19), the comet had appeared after the death of Attalus, and not in his reign, as Seneca says.

(Q) Justin tells us (20), that his governors made him ride and perform his exercises on a wild and unmanageable horse, which he governed with such skill and dexterity, that his very enemies could not but admire and applaud him. They had afterwards recourse to poison; but he being apprised of their treacherous designs, armed himself against them with such antidotes and preservatives, that when he attempted in his old age to poison himself, the most exquisite poisons rather nourished than destroyed the constitution of his body. Martial (21) says, that he was from his in-

In his youth, to inure his body to hardships, he applied himself to the manly exercise of hunting, passing whole months in the open fields, and often taking his rest amidst the frozen snow. When he came of age, he married his own sister, by name Laodice, a thing frequently practised in those days by the eastern kings, and had by her a son named Pharnaces. Having now an heir to his kingdom, and aspiring to nothing less than the empire of all Asia, attended with a few friends, he undertook a progress thro' the various kingdoms of that great continent, with a design to observe the customs, laws, and manners of the inhabitants, to learn their different languages, whereof he is said to have spoke twenty two, to take an estimate of their strength, and above all, to view narrowly their strong holds, and fortified towns. In this journey he spent three years, during which time it being noised abroad that he was dead, his wife Laodice gave herself up to all manner of lewdness; and having brought forth a son by a criminal conversation with one of the lords of her court, to conceal her guilt, and avoid the just resentment of her provoked husband, welcomed him on his return with a poisoned potion, which had no other effect but to incense him more against her, and hasten her own destruction, which was soon effected by his order, all those being involved in the same punishment, who were any ways accessory to her incontinency and disloyalty <sup>k</sup>.

AND now thinking it time to put in execution his vast Invades designs, he invaded, and easily reduced the neighbouring Paphlago- kingdom of Paphlagonia, which he divided with his friend nia. and ally Nicomedes king of Bithynia. As the Romans had not long before declared Paphlagonia a free state, they sent em-

He was the inventor of Mithridate, which borrowed its name from him, as Pliny, Paulus, Ægineta, Cornelius Celsus, Gellius, Galen witness, and Q. Sereus in the following verses :

ambassadors to both kings, injoining them to withdraw their forces, and restore that nation to its former condition. Mithridates returned answer, that Paphlagonia had belonged to his father, and therefore was his by inheritance, adding, that he could not well understand why the Romans, without being appealed to, should trouble themselves about controversies arising among the princes of Asia. The ambassadors threatened him with war; but he was so far from being intimidated by their menaces, that from Paphlagonia he marched directly into Galatia, which he made himself master of, though it was at that time under the protection of the people of Rome. Having thus reduced Paphlagonia and Galatia, the next kingdom he cast his eyes upon was that of Cappadocia, held at that time by Ariarathes, who had married his sister, and with whom he had lived in great friendship. As Ariarathes was one of the most powerful princes in all Asia, and a great favourite of the Romans, in whose service his father had been killed, during their war with Aristonicus, Mithridates thought it safer to attempt the accomplishing of his designs by treachery, than by dint of arms, and accordingly bribed one Gordius privately to dispatch him. Upon his death Nicomedes king of Bithynia invaded Cappadocia, and having driven out the son of the deceased prince, married his widow, in hopes of establishing himself by that means on the throne. This gave Mithridates a plausible pretence of falling upon Cappadocia, and at the same time of weakening his former ally, but now rival, Nicomedes. For under pretence of restoring his nephew, he made war upon Nicomedes, and drove him quite out of Cappadocia. As this war gained him the reputation, not only of gallantry, but good-nature, (for no body imagined that he had any hand in the murder of Ariarathes) out of a certain regard to public fame he restored the kingdom of Cappadocia to its lawful owner, and marched his troops back into his own territories. But soon after repenting what he had done, and preferring power to fame, he began to seek some pretence of quarrelling with his nephew. With this view he pressed him to recal from banishment Gordius, who had assassinated his father; which the young prince highly resenting, and Mithridates threatening to bring him back by force of arms, matters were brought by degrees to that pass, that both princes took the field. Mithridates entered Cappadocia at the head of an army consisting of eighty thousand foot, ten thousand horse, and six hundred chariots armed with scythes, hoping with such a powerful army to carry all before him; but finding his nephew ready to receive him with a strength no-ways inferior to his own, he altered his design; and feigning a desire of reconciliation, invited him to a conference; which the young prince willingly agreeing to, Mithridates in sight of both armies stabbed him with a dagger, which he had concealed in the plaits of his garment (R). This barbarous and unexpected piece of treachery struck the Cappadocians with such terror and amazement, that they immediately threw down their arms, and suffered Mithridates without any molestation to seize on all the strong-holds of the kingdom; which he resigned to his son, a child but eight years old, calling him Ariarathes, a name peculiar to the kings of Cappadocia, and committing both him and the whole management of his affairs to the care of Gordius. But the Cappadocians, disdaining to be ruled by a public assassin, shook off the tyrannical yoke, and placed on the throne the brother of their late king, who to that time had kept himself concealed in some city of Asia. But his reign was short, being soon driven out by Mithridates, and the Cappadocians again brought under subjection. The unhappy prince seeing himself thus stript of his paternal kingdom, and reduced to the utmost misery, no body daring to entertain him through fear of Mithridates, died of grief in the very flower of his age; and in him was extinct the family of Pharnaces, which had ruled over Cappadocia from the time of Cyrus the Great.

UPON his death Nicomedes king of Bithynia, being jealous of the overgrown power of Mithridates, and fearing lest he should fall upon his dominions, if he were suffered to enjoy quietly the neighbouring kingdom of Cappadocia, suborned a youth of a comely and majestic aspect to pass himself upon the Romans for the son of Ariarathes, as if he had left three sons, and not two only, as was commonly believed. The youth being well instructed how to behave himself, and

(R) It was a custom in antient times among kings, as Justin informs us (22), to send persons of distinction to search each other before they met, lest any treacherous designs might be carried on under colour of a friendly conference. The person who was appointed to search Mithridates, being very busy in looking for some weapon under his belly, the king desired him to take heed, lest he should find there a weapon of a very different nature from that which he was so carefully looking for. This jest raised in the spectators a loud laughter, and made the searcher desist from any farther inquiries; by which means the dagger, which Mithridates had brought, was concealed.

what he should say, set out for Rome ; and there presenting himself before the senate, complained with tears in his eyes of the monstrous and unnatural cruelty of his uncle Mithridates, bewailed the untimely death of his brothers, expatiated on the services of his grandfather, who had lost his life in the cause of the republic ; and concluded his speech by intreating them to convince the world of the tender regard they had for their friends, by restoring to his paternal kingdom the grandson of one, whom they had thought fit to honour with that glorious title. The senate was no less affected by his speech, than taken by his modesty, address, and graceful mien. Being ordered to withdraw, Laodice, the widow of Ariarathes and sister to Mithridates, who upon her husband's death had married Nicomedes, as we have hinted before, came in and deposed that she had three sons by her former husband Ariarathes, of which the petitioner was one. Whereupon the senate with many kind and grateful expressions promised to espouse his cause, and never forsake him, till he was reinstated in the kingdom of his forefathers. But in the mean time Mithridates receiving notice of the plot, dispatched Gordius to Rome to disclose it to the senate, and assure them, that the child, whom he had preferred to the crown, was the lawful son of Ariarathes. This unexpected embassy raised a strong suspicion of both kings in the minds of the senators, who thereupon examining more narrowly into the matter, and discovering the deceit, commanded Mithridates to relinquish Cappadocia, and Nicomedes Paphlagonia. Both these states were by a decree of the senate declared free ; but the Cappadocians, protesting that they could not live without a king, were allowed to chuse one of their own body. Mithridates used great interest in behalf of Gordius ; but he being excluded by the Romans, Ariobarzanes was preferred to the crown by the majority of votes, as Strabo informs us, or, as Justin has it, by appointment of the senate.

AND now the Romans, growing jealous of the power of Mithridates, and the sway which he bore among the princes of Asia, sent L. Cornelius Sylla into Cappadocia under appearance of an embassy, but in reality to disappoint the measures which he was pursuing, and the steps he was taking to grasp the empire of all Asia. Sylla with a handful of men defeated Gordius, cut in pieces his army composed of Cappadocians and Armenians, and settled, according to the decree of the senate, Ariobarzanes on the throne. But Sylla had no sooner set out for Rome, than Mithridates, who had suffered his son to be driven from the throne of Cappadocia, as if that war

no-ways concerned him, stirred up Tigranes king of Armenia against Ariobarzanes, who, upon his approach, abandoning the kingdom, fled to Rome. Tigranes, having without the loss of one man possessed himself of Cappadocia, placed anew on the throne Ariarathes, son to Mithridates, and restored all things to the state they were in before the arrival of Sylla.

At the same time Nicomedes Philopator, king of Bithynia, dying, Mithridates invaded that kingdom, and drove out his natural son, named also Nicomedes, whom the Romans had appointed to succeed him, placing in his room his own brother

Socrates, surnamed Chrestus, or the Thrifty. Nicomedes likewise fled to Rome, where it was decreed by the senate, that both he and Ariobarzanes should be restored to their kingdoms. In pursuance of which decree, Manius Aquilius, who had then ended the servile war in Sicily, and Marcus Altinius, being sent into Asia in quality of legates, and there joined by the forces of Lucius Cassius governor of Asia Pergamena, or Asia Proper, and by the auxiliaries of the allied kings, Nicomedes was reinstated in the kingdom of Bithynia, and Ariobarzanes in that of Cappadocia. The legates according to their instructions charged both kings to make frequent inroads into the neighbouring territories of Mithridates, and practise there whatever hostilities they could, assuring them of the powerful assistance of the Romans, in case he should resent the provocation. This the legates did to pick a quarrel with Mithridates, who, not thinking himself as yet a match for the Romans, had tamely suffered both his brother and his son to be driven out of the kingdoms which they had usurped. Ariobarzanes could by no means be induced to provoke so powerful a neighbour; but Nicomedes, being partly with promises, partly with menaces, prevailed upon to comply with the injunctions of the legates, entered Pontus in a hostile manner, and putting all to fire and sword, laid waste whole provinces, without meeting with the least opposition. For Mithridates, to justify in the eyes of the world the war which he had long designed against the Romans, had ordered his lieutenants to forbear returning any hostilities, till such time as he had laid his complaints before the legates. This he did soon after, sending one Pelopidas to expostulate with them about the proceedings of Nicomedes. But the legates returning answer, that he having being the first aggressor, Nicomedes had but paid him in his own coin, and that they would not suffer him to use any violence against their friend and ally, Mithridates thought it high time, having on foot a numerous and well-disciplined army, to enter upon action; and accordingly sent his son Ariarathes into Cappadocia, who put to flight the united forces of Ariobarzanes and Alti-nius the Roman legate, and anew took possession of that kingdom. At the same time Nicomedes making new inroads into Pontus, Mithridates, to gain time, and make the Romans believe that he was still inclined to peace, dispatched embassadors to Rome to beg of the senate, that, if Nicomedes was their friend, they would oblige him by their authority to forbear giving him any further molestation ; but if they accounted him an enemy, they would give him leave to do himself justice, and repel force by force. The senate, being well apprised of Mithridates's views, replied, that Nicomedes had done nothing without just provocation, and therefore they saw no cause why they should lay any injunctions on him ; whereas they had many things to injoin Mithridates, but above all, to restore without further delay the kingdom of Cappadocia to its lawful owner, and conclude a speedy peace with their friend and ally Nicomedes, on pain of being accounted an enemy to Rome, and treated accordingly. With this answer the embassadors were dismissed, and the same day ordered to depart the city ; but before their departure charged to acquaint their master, that the people of Rome would admit of no embassadors from him, till such time as he had complied with these their commands <sup>k</sup>.

IN the mean time the legates in Asia drawing together what forces they could muster in Bithynia, Cappadocia, Paphlagonia, and Galatia, and being joined by Cassius governor of Asia, took the field without waiting for the determination of the senate. They divided their army into several small bodies : Cassius encamped on the confines of Bithynia and Galatia ; Aquilius with his body possessed himself of the avenues leading from Pontus into Bithynia ; Q. Oppius secured the entrance into Cappadocia ; and Minutius Rufus and C. Popilius admirals lay with a fleet of three hundred sail at Byzantium, to prevent the enemy from entering into the Euxine sea. Each of the generals had an army of forty thousand men under his command, besides a body of fifty thousand foot and six thousand horse, which Nicomedes brought to their assistance <sup>l</sup>.

ON the other side Mithridates, having inticed many of the neighbouring nations to join him against the Romans, found at the general rendezvous, that his whole strength consisted of two hundred and fifty thousand foot, fifty thousand horse, a hundred and thirty chariots armed with scythes, three hundred ships, and one hundred gallies. Nicomedes, as he was on his march to take possession of an important post, according to the direction of the Roman generals, happened to fall in with a numerous body of the enemies; whereupon a bloody battle ensued, the victory inclining some time to one side, and some time to another. The fight lasted many hours, both armies behaving themselves with the utmost gallantry and resolution. But at last the Bithynians, though far superior in number, being put in disorder by the armed chariots, which mowed down intire files, betook themselves to flight, leaving behind them their baggage, money, and provisions, which fell to the conqueror. Nicomedes, the greater part of his men being slain, with much ado got into Paphlagonia, and from thence marched with the remains of his scattered army to join Cassius. Nicomedes being thus driven out of the field, Mithridates detached part of his army, under the command of Neoptolemus and Nemanus an Armenian, to fall upon Aquilius, who guarded the passes leading into Bithynia with an army of forty thousand foot and four thousand horse. Upon their approach Aquilius withdrew his forces in good order, but being pursued close, and harassed on his march by the enemy, he resolved to venture a battle, which proved very unsuccessful, ten thousand of his men being killed on the spot, three hundred taken prisoners, and the rest quite dispersed. The legate himself, attended by a small body of horse, having the same night reached the river Sangarius, swam over, and arrived safe at Pergamus<sup>m</sup>. Upon the news of this double overthrow, the other Roman generals abandoned their posts, and left Mithridates master of the field. The fleet also dispersed, and the greater part of the ships were either taken or sunk by the king's admirals. Mithridates resolved to improve the opportunity which now offered of accomplishing his designs; and, driving the Romans quite out of Asia, over-ran all Phrygia, Mysia, Asia Proper, Caria, Lycia, Pamphylia, Paphlagonia, Bithynia, and whatever other countries either belonged to, or had sided with, the Romans, as far as Ionia. He was received every-where with all possible demonstrations of joy, the inhabitants flocking to him in white garments, and calling him their father, their deliverer, their god, the great and sole lord of all Asia<sup>n</sup>. What thus gained him the affections of the people, was his kind usage to the prisoners he had taken in the two engagements ; for he not only sent them all home without ransom, but furnished with good store of provisions, and even money to defray the expences of their journey. This piece of good nature was every-where so cried up by his friends, and had such an effect on the minds of his enemies, that all the nations of Asia shewed an ambition to live under the mild government of so clement a prince. Embassadors came flocking to him from all parts, and among others those of Laodicea on the Lycus, to whom the king promised his protection, on condition they delivered up to him Q. Oppius, governor of Pamphylia, who had retreated thither. The inhabitants readily complied with his desire, and sent Oppius to him in chains, ordering lictors to walk before him with their fasces, in derision of the Roman pride and ostentation. Mithridates was overjoyed to see a Roman general, and a proconsul, his prisoner ; and his joy was soon after encreased by the delivery of Manius Aquilius, whom the Lesbians, revolting from the Romans, sent to him in fetters, with many other Romans of distinction. As he had been the chief author and promoter of the war, Mithridates led him about with him, whithersoever he went, either bound on an ass, or on foot coupled to one Bysrtes, a public malefactor, forcing him to proclaim with his own mouth to the crowds flocking to see him, that he was Manius Aquilius the Roman legate.

His generals too were attended with like success, the cities, where-ever they appeared, voluntarily submitting to them, and contributing large sums of money to defray the charges of the war. By this means he amassed such treasures as enabled him to maintain several numerous armies on foot for the space of five years, without levying any taxes or tributes on his subjects †.

As most of the provinces subdued by Mithridates, were either subject or allied to Rome, many Roman citizens had settled in the chief cities, and were dispersed all over Asia. Mithridates considering these as so many spies, who would not fail to observe his motions, and acquaint the senate with his designs, took the most cruel and inhuman method of ridding himself of them, that had been heard of till his time, but has been practised in after-ages by other nations. He dispatched private letters to all the governors and magistrates of the cities where the Romans resided, injoining them, on pain of death, and utter destruction of their country, to cause all of the Italian race, women and children not excepted, to be murdered on the thirtieth day from the date of his letters, and to let their bodies lie unburied in the open fields. One moiety of their goods was to be forfeited to the king, and the other bestowed as a reward on the assassins. Whatever slave murdered his master, was to receive his liberty; and one half of the debt was to be remitted to the debtor that should kill his creditor. Whoever concealed any of the Italian race, under what pretence soever, was to be punished with immediate death (R). When the fatal day came, a day, as Tully calls it, of horror and confusion, the gates of the cities being shut, and all the outlets beset with soldiers, the king's orders were proclaimed; which caused an universal alarm and consternation, not in those only who were destined to die, but in such of the natives too as had the least spark of humanity, seeing themselves obliged, either to betray and barbarously murder their innocent guests, friends, and relations, or be liable themselves to a cruel death. However, as most of the Asiatics bore a mortal hatred to the Romans, and were moreover animated by the promise of an ample reward, the king's orders were without delay put in execution, and all Asia in one day turned into a shambles <sup>n</sup>. The inhabitants of Ephesus, where Mithridates then resided, dragged such as had taken sanctuary in Diana's temple, from the very statue of the goddess, and put them to the sword. The Per-gamenians discharged showers of darts upon them, as they embraced the statues in the temple of Esculapius. At Adramyttium in Mysia many were murdered in the water, while they were attempting, with their children on their backs, to swim over to the island of Lesbos. The Caunians, who not long before had been delivered by the Romans from the yoke of the Rhodians, and restored to their antient privileges, excelled in cruelty all the rest; for, as if they had apostatized from human nature, they took pleasure in tormenting and butchering the innocent children under their mothers eyes; some of them running distracted, and others dying for grief at a sight which nature could not bear. The Trallians were the only people on the continent, who could not find in their hearts to imbrue their hands in the blood of their innocent guests. However, as the king's orders were peremptory, they hired one Theophilus, a Paphlagonian, to dispatch the few Romans that lived among them. He having shut them all up together in the temple of Concord, first cut off their hands as they embraced the statues of the gods, and then hacked them to pieces <sup>o</sup>. Many Romans were saved on the floating islands of Lydia, called Calaminæ, where they concealed themselves, till such time as they found an opportunity of making their escape out of Asia <sup>p</sup>; but nevertheless a hundred and fifty thousand Roman citizens were massacred that day, according to Plutarch and Dion <sup>q</sup>; but according to others, only eighty thousand <sup>r</sup>.

(R) Theophanes the Asitylenian, who wrote the life of Pompey, tells us, that P. Rutilius Rufus, a man of proconsular dignity, who had been banished Rome, and lived at that time in Asia, put Mithridates upon this barbarous resolution; and adds, that Pompey found in the fort Caino, amongst many other valuable books, an oration composed by Rutilius, wherein he stirred up the king to this massacre (23). But Tully assures us (24), that Rutilius had no hand in it, having saved himself by disguising his condition with a philosopher's mantle, and in that garb making his escape, as some others did, out of Asia, undiscovered.

Mithridates, having thus got rid of such as could any ways disturb him in the quiet possession of his conquests on the continent, imbarqued great part of his forces in order to reduce the adjacent islands. He sailed first to Cos, where he was joyfully received by the natives, who delivered up to him Alexander, the son of king Alexander, who being driven from the throne of Egypt, was killed by Chareas a sea captain, as he was retiring in a small vessel to Cyprus. With the young prince they put into the king's hands vast sums of money, with all the golden vessels and jewels to an immense value, which his grandmother Cleopatra had left with him, and had been amassing for many years. To the young prince Mithridates gave an education suitable to his birth, and ever treated him like a king's son, but kept the treasures for himself <sup>f</sup>. Here likewise he found eight hundred talents in ready money, which at the first breaking out of the war had been deposited by the Jews of Asia in this island, as in a place of safety, and was designed, as Josephus informs us <sup>i</sup>, for the temple of Jerusalem. From Cos the king steered his course to the island of Rhodes, where all the Romans, who had escaped out of Asia, found a sanctuary, and amongst others L. Cassius the pro-consul. The Rhodians, upon the first news of the king's being at sea, equipped their fleet, and put their city in a posture of defence, determined, neither to deliver up the Romans, nor admit him within their gates. As he drew near, they ordered their admiral, by name Damagoras, a man of great experience in sea affairs, to meet him, and if possible, draw him to a battle, knowing that his fleet, tho' superior in number, was but very indifferently manned. As the Rhodians advanced, the king's fleet retired, making towards the coasts of Lycia; but Damagoras chasing them, six of his ships came up with twenty five of the king's, and after a sharp engagement sunk two, and put the rest to flight. In this encounter Mithridates, though he had never before seen a sea-fight, behaved with extraordinary courage and intrepidity; but one of the ships of his own squadron falling foul of that which carried him, by which accident he was very near being taken prisoner, he ever after abhorred the sea, and took an aversion to all the Chians, because the pilot of that ship was a Chian. However, being unwilling to give over the enterprize, he took new forces on board, with great store of warlike engines to batter the city, and unexpectedly appeared again on the coasts; but was anew forced to retire with disgrace, and lay aside all thoughts of reducing the island <sup>u</sup>.

Mithridates, being thus disappointed at Rhodes, intrusted his generals with the command of his armies, and himself retired to Pergamus, there to settle the civil government of Asia, and levy new forces to be sent to his generals as they should have occasion for them. Archelaus, commander in chief of all his forces, was sent into Greece, with an army of an hun-

From Athens he detached parties to reduce the neighbouring castles and the island of Delos, which they did accordingly; but the island was soon recovered by Orobias a Roman general, who hearing that the enemies kept no guards, but passed their time in debauchery and carousing, by the favour of a dark night, landed without being perceived, and falling upon them in one of their revels, put every man of that party to the sword, except Apellicon the commander, who found means to make his escape w. Metrophanes, another of the king's generals, entering Eubæa, laid waste the whole country, exerting his rage chiefly against the cities of Demetrias and Magnesia, which refused to admit him within their gates. But as he was sailing off with a great booty, Bruttius prætor or governor of Macedonia, coming up with him, sunk some of his ships, and took others, putting all the prisoners to the sword. Mithridates upon the news of this loss, sent his son Ariarathes with a powerful army to invade Macedonia, which he soon reduced, and then with the kingdom of Thrace, driving the Romans ~~every where~~ before him. The generals which he sent into other quarters were no less successful, having, at the return of the Romans into Greece, as Aulus Gellius *, Valerius Maximus †, and Quintilian ‡ assure us, twenty five different nations, which paid him homage. The same authors add, that he was skilled in every one of their various languages, so as to speak with the natives without an interpreter whenever he had occasion. Among these we find reckoned the Rhoxani, now Russians or Muscovites, whom Diophantes, one of the king's generals, brought under subjection, after having slain in one engagement fifty thousand of the Barbarians, who came with an innumerable army to oppose him. And now Mithridates was master not only of Asia, but of all Greece and the adjacent islands, except Rhodes, as far as the Cyclades.

THE intestine broils and civil dissensions, which at this time reigned in Rome, proved a favourable opportunity for Mithridates to extend thus the confines of his empire; but at last the senate upon certain advice that he designed to invade Italy, and had even been invited thither by the Italians, who had revolted from them, began seriously to deliberate on the means of opposing so powerful and insulting an enemy. Lucius Sylla, who on many occasions had given signal proofs of his courage, conduct, and experience in war, was appointed general, and ordered with all possible expedition to sail over into Greece, where Archelaus domineered without controul. He put to sea with five legions only and a few cohorts, and landing in Attica detached part of his forces to lay siege to Athens, he himself marching with the main body of his small army against Archelaus, who was encamped near Piræum <sup>a</sup> (S). Upon his approach Archelaus retired within the walls, and Sylla, as winter was drawing on, contented himself to cut off his communication with Athens by a deep trench, which he continued from the mountains quite to the sea. By this means the city for want of provisions fell into his hands, as he himself relates in his commentaries, on the calends of March <sup>b</sup>. Aristio, who was at the head of the king's party, retired with those of his faction into the castle, where they held out for a long time, but at last being obliged for want of water to surrender at discretion, Sylla commanded Aristio to be put to death, and all of those who had bore any employment under the king, or in any ways violated the constitutions, which the Romans had established after the conquest of Greece.

(S) Mithridates at that time resided at Pergamus, where amongst many other prodigies mentioned by the ancient writers, it is said, that at the same instant Sylla put to sea, the Pergamenians in the theatre were letting down with engines a statue of victory, bearing a crown to be put on the king's head; but the crown before it reached him fell to the ground, and was dashed in pieces, which accident being looked upon as a bad omen, struck the people and Mithridates himself with great terror (25). At Stratopedon the crows killed a vultur, and the goddess Isis was seen to strike with thunder a star fallen from heaven. The same author adds, that while the king was firing a grove consecrated to the furies, a great laughing was heard among the trees, but no body could be found, and that the king being advised by the soothsayers to sacrifice a virgin to the furies, the young woman was taken with such a fit of laughing, that the sacrifice being disturbed, the priests thought fit to give it over.

nea.

As Archelaus had a powerful fleet, and Sylla but a few frigates, he dispatched L. Lucullus, his lieutenant general, a man of great repute among the Romans, to the island of Rhodes, with orders to the Rhodians to join him with their fleet. But this being found impracticable, by reason that the king's fleet had, as it were, overspread the whole sea, Lucullus, despising all danger, ventured out boldly with six frigates only, and sailing to Syria, Egypt, Libya, and Cyprus, returned with such supplies of ships and experienced mariners, as enabled Sylla after their conjunction with the Rhodian fleet, to act offensively even by sea. Archelaus finding himself thus straitened on all sides, dispatched messengers to Taxiles, who commanded in Thrace and Macedonia, inviting him to his relief. Taxiles made what haste he could, and having joined Archelaus, they both marched against Sylla, leading under their colours a hundred and twenty thousand men. On the other side, Sylla, being acquainted with their designs, was in full march to meet them, though his whole army consisted but of fifteen hundred horse and fifteen thousand foot. The two armies came in sight of each other near the city of Chæroneia, and neither declining the engagement, the Romans, animated by the example of their leader, and an eager desire of revenging the death of their fellow-citizens massacred in Asia by the king's order, put that day a hundred and ten thousand of the enemy to the sword, having lost on their side but twelve men, as Sylla himself witnesses in his commentaries. Archelaus narrowly escaped with the remains of his army to Chalcis.

THE success which attended Sylla, raised new jealousies against him at Rome, where the contrary faction began to prevail. Whereupon the senate sent Lucius Valerius Flaccus, consul of that year, with two legions into Asia, in appearance to attack Mithridates on that side, but with private instructions to fall upon Sylla, if he found him disaffected to the senate. As Flaccus had no experience in war, C. Fimbria, a senator of great repute among the soldiery, was appointed to attend him with the character of legate or lieutenant general. Sylla was at that time in Bæotia, but hearing what measures the senate had taken against him, he left that province, and with all expedition marched into Thessaly with a design to meet Flaccus, who, having imbarqued his troops at Brundisium, was steering his course towards that province. But Sylla being arrived at the city of Melitea, intelligence was brought him, that the country, which he had abandoned, was over-run with a powerful army of the king's under the command of Dorylaus, his chief favourite. Dorylaus Upon this advice he returned into Bæotia, and in two successive engagements gained two signal victories, which put Sylla an end to the war in Greece. In the first encounter Dorylaus lost fifteen thousand men, as Appian and Orosius inform us <sup>d</sup>; or two hundred thousand, as Eutropius will have it; in the second the remaining part of the army, which consisted of ninety thousand chosen troops, was intirely cut off; twenty thousand were driven into a river, where they all perished; an equal number was surrounded, and all put to the sword, in a marsh, whither they had retired; the rest were killed in the flight, the Romans giving no quarter to men that had treated their fellow-citizens after so barbarous a manner in Asia. Plutarch tells us <sup>e</sup>, that the marshes were died with blood, that the course of the river was stopt by the dead bodies, and that even in his time, that is near two hundred years after, a great many bows, helmets, coats of mail, and swords were found buried in the mud. Archelaus, who had joined Dorylaus, with a body of ten thousand men a few days before the battle, lay three days stript and naked among the dead, till he found a small vessel which carried him over into Eubæa, where he mustered together what troops he could, but was never in a condition to take the field. As for Sylla he gave up the province of Bæotia to be plundered by his soldiers, as being ready to revolt on every fresh occasion. From Bæotia he marched into Thessaly, where he took up his winter quarters, and caused his old ships to be refitted, and several new ones to be built, in order to pass over into Asia in the beginning of the spring, and drive from thence not only Mithridates, but also his rival Flaccus, whom the senate had in opposition to him appointed governor of that province (T).

Differences arise between Flaccus &
Fimbria.

IN the mean time Flaccus, being joined by the Roman allies in Asia, had possessed himself of Byzantium, and from thence marched into Bithynia, where upon some differences arising between him and his legate Fimbria, some of the soldiery sided with one, and some with the other, which the consul, as he was of a haughty and imperious temper, not being able to bear, deprived Fimbria of his command and named another in his room. Fimbria being thus cashiered repaired to Byzantium, where he prevailed upon that part of the army which Flaccus had left there, to forsake the consul and follow him. With this body he crossed the Hellepont, and obliged all the cities of that neighbourhood, without distinction of friend or foe, to contribute large sums towards the maintenance of his army, allowing at the same time his soldiers an uncontrouled licence to commit all sorts of villainies and rapine. This liberty brought daily over to him a great many from Flaccus, insomuch, that thinking himself now a match for the consul, he took upon himself the supreme command, and turned out all the civil as well as the military officers, which Flaccus had appointed, placing his own creatures in their room. Such extraordinary proceedings soon brought back Flaccus from Chalcedon, whither he had sailed with his fleet; but finding Fimbria's party stronger than he expected, he was forced to conceal himself in a friend's house, till he had an opportunity of stealing away in the night-time to Chalcedon, and from thence to Nicomedia. Fimbria, having intelligence of his flight, pursued him close, took Nicomedia by storm, and dragging the consul from a well, where he lay concealed, put him to death. His head he threw into the sea, and left the body unburied on the shore <sup>f</sup>. Upon the death of Flaccus, Fimbria took upon himself the command of all the Roman forces in Asia, besieged and took a great many towns, but at the same time practised such cruelties upon Cruelties of persons of all ranks, that his name became more odious than Fimbria. even that of Mithridates, (U). Having persuaded the inhabitants of Cyzicum to admit him as a friend into the city, he not only plundered it, but put the most wealthy citizens to death in order to seize on their estates, as if they had been guilty of treason; others he forced with threats to give up to him all they had<sup>g</sup>. The minds of the Asiatics being by the cruelty of Fimbria alienated from the Romans, Mithridates, in order to improve this hatred into an open revolt, commanded his son, by name also Mithridates, to join Taxiles, Diophantes, and Menander, three of the most experienced commanders he had, and to return at the head of a numerous army into Asia, not doubting but the inhabitants, thus harassed by Fimbria, would shake off the Roman yoke, when they saw so powerful an army in the field ready to protect them. Fimbria distrustful of the Asiatics, marched out to meet the enemy, and offer them battle before they entered the province. As the king's army was far superior to his in number, the Romans suffered greatly in the engagement, but held out till night parted them, when they withdrew to the opposite side of a river, which was at a small distance from the field of battle. Here they designed to intrench themselves. But in the mean time a dreadful storm arising, Fimbria laid hold of that opportunity, and fording the river in the dead of the night, surprized the enemy, and made such a havock of them, as they lay in their tents, that only the commanders and some few troops of horse escaped<sup>h</sup>. Among these was the king's son, who attended with a few horse got safe to Pergamus where his father resided. But Fimbria, pursuing him night and day without intermission, entered Pergamus sword in hand; and hearing that both the father and son had fled

The treachery of Archelaus is also mentioned by Sallust (28), who introduces Mithridates complaining of him in a letter to Arfaces, in the following words: Archelaus, the most unworthy of all those who were under me, gave a check to my enterprises by betraying my army. And Strabo (29) informs us, that Archelaus was afterwards greatly esteemed and caressed both by Sylla and the senate. But Sylla himself, in his commentaries (30), and Dio (31), endeavour to clear Archelaus, from all suspicion of treachery.

(U) Dio gives us an instance of his cruelty (32). Having, says he, one day set up some posts, to which he used to cause men to be fastened, and whipt to death, he found that there were more posts provided, than persons condemned to that punishment. Whereupon he commanded some of the spectators to be seized, fastened to the posts and whipt to death, lest they should seem to have been set up to no purpose.

from thence a few hours before his arrival, he continued the pursuit, and would have taken the king himself prisoner, had he not thrown himself with a considerable body of horse into Pritane. This place Fimbria immediately invested, blocking up all the avenues by which the king could make his escape by land; but as he had no ships to intercept his retreat by sea, he dispatched a messenger to Lucullus, who commanded the Roman navy in Asia, intreating him, as he tendered the welfare of his country, to make what haste he could to Pritane, and assist him with his fleet in taking one, who of all the kings in the world was the most cruel and implacable enemy of the people of Rome. but Lucullus, being swayed by a party-grudge more than by the good of the republic, would not stir out of the harbour, though he might with all ease, as his fleet was riding but at a small distance, at once have put an end to a war, which afterwards cost the people of Rome so much blood and treasure. Fimbria, finding himself thus disappointed, carried on the siege with all possible vigour, in hopes of making himself master of the town, before the king's fleet could come to his relief. But as the town was well fortified both by art and nature, and defended by a numerous garrison, animated by the king's presence and example, before the Romans could approach the walls, the fleet appeared, and being received with loud shouts of joy, took the king on board, and to the eternal disgrace of Lucullus, carried him, without the least molestation, to Mitylene <sup>1</sup>.

Fimbria soon after the king's departure took the place by storm, and reduced most of the cities of Asia, setting large fines on such as did not voluntarily submit. As he approached the antient city of Troy, the Trojans shut their gates against him, and at the same time sent deputies to Sylla, declaring, that they were ready to submit to him, and begging his protection against the cruelty and avarice of Fimbria. Sylla commended them for returning to their antient alliance with the people of Rome, and promised to hasten to their relief, adding, that it was no matter whether they submitted to him, or to Fimbria, they being both citizens of Rome, and originally descended from the Trojans. But at the same time he warned Fimbria by a messenger not to molest those who had submitted to him, and on that regard ought to be looked upon as allies of Rome. This embassy fired Fimbria's haughty temper, who thereupon laying close siege to the town, carried it by storm the eleventh day, bragging, that he had reduced in so short a time a city, which Agamemnon had not been able to master in less than ten years, though assisted by a fleet of a thousand ships and the whole power of Greece. Entering the city he put most of the inhabitants to the sword, not sparing even those who had taken sanctuary in the temple of Minerva, which he caused to be burnt with all that were in it. He levelled the walls with the ground, set fire to the houses and temples, and reduced the city to a heap of ashes. He racked and murdered in a most barbarous manner those that had been employed on the embassy to Sylla, and in short did not leave one house standing, or one soul alive in the whole town that he could meet with (W).

Mithridates, being thus pressed by Fimbria in Asia, and by Sylla in Greece, and his fleet intirely defeated in two sea-engagements by Lucullus, began to be weary of the war; and accordingly charged Archelaus to strike up a peace with Sylla upon as honourable conditions as he could. On the other hand, Sylla, hearing of the strange disorders that Cinna and Carbo, the leading men of the adverse party, committed at Rome, was very willing to put an end to the war, and hasten to the relief of his friends, who were daily flocking to him, being banished their country for favouring his cause. Wherefore on the first notice of the king's intention, he went in person to confer with Archelaus; who, meeting him at Apollo's temple near Delos, advised him to return home, and succour his friends at Rome, where the opposite faction grew daily stronger by his absence; he offered him what ships, men, and money he pleased, and assured him that the

But Julius Obsequens and Appian assure us, that the temple was burnt; and add, that amongst the ruins the famous palladium, which Diomedes and Ulysses were supposed to have stolen, was found safe and entire. Servius (34) tells us, that the palladium was on this occasion discovered by Fimbria, and afterwards brought to Rome. This second destruction of Troy, happened, according to Appian (35), in the hundred and seventy third olympiad, a thousand and fifty years after the first; but Eratosthenes, Apollodorus, and Diodorus Siculus, compute a thousand and ninety nine years between the taking of Troy by the Greeks, and the fourth year of the hundred and seventy-third olympiad, when this desolation by Fimbria happened.

king would assist him to the utmost of his power. On the other hand, Sylla endeavoured to persuade Archelaus to deliver up to him the king's fleet, promising, in case he complied with his request, to place him on the throne of Pontus, and honour him with the title of a friend and ally of the people of Rome. But Archelaus shewing the utmost abhorrency of such an infamous piece of treachery, Sylla proposed some preliminaries, one of which was, that Mithridates should forthwith withdraw his garisons from all the places that were not possessed by him before the war broke out. This article was agreed to by Archelaus, and several places immediately evacuated; but, concerning the others, he wrote to the king to know his pleasure therein. Mithridates sent without delay embassadors to Sylla, charging them, among other things, to dissuade Sylla from insisting on the delivery of Paphlagonia and the fleet, which was one of the preliminaries. This put Sylla in so violent a passion, that he was with much ado prevailed upon to continue the conferences. But Archelaus desiring to be sent to the king, and assuring Sylla that he would either dispatch him, or make him conclude a peace upon Sylla's own terms, he was appeased. Archelaus was as good as his word; for on his return he acquainted Sylla, that the king had submitted to his terms; but at the same time shewed a great desire of having an interview with him before matters were quite settled; which Sylla agreeing to, they met at Dardanus a city of Troas. The king came attended with twenty thousand foot, six hundred horse, and a great many chariots armed with scythes, besides a fleet of six hundred ships. Sylla had but two legions with him, and two hundred horse. Both armies being drawn up, Mithridates and Sylla retired with a small retinue into a neighbouring field. The king coming up to Sylla, offered to embrace him, but he stopt him, desiring first to know whether he was willing to conclude a peace upon the terms which Archelaus had proposed to him. Mithridates at first desired that some alterations might be made, but the Roman general so terrified him with his passionate and threatening speech, that he consented without exception to all he required; and then Sylla having embraced and kissed him, after mutual expressions of friendship they parted, Mithridates retiring into Pontus, according to their agreement, and Sylla advancing to Thyatira, where Fimbria lay incamped<sup>d</sup>. The conditions of the peace were as follow: that Mithridates should relinquish all his conquests, and content himself with his paternal dominions, which were confined within the limits of Pontus: that he should forthwith resign Bithynia to Nicomedes, and Cappadocia to Ariobarzanes, and release without ransom all the captives and prisoners he had made during the war: that he should pay to the Romans two, or, as Memnon has it, three thousand talents, and deliver up to Sylla eighty ships, with all their arms and ammunition, and five hundred archers: lastly, that he should not any ways molest such cities or persons as had, during the war, revolted from him, and sided with the Romans<sup>c</sup>. Thus ended the first Mithridatic war, to the great disadvantage of the king, and to Sylla's glory, who, in less than three years time, drove him out of Greece, Macedon, Ionia, and the province of Asia, confined him within the narrow bounds of his father's kingdom, and killed above a hundred and sixty thousand of his best troops, without losing one thousand of his own.

AND now Sylla having no other enemy to contend with, led his army against Fimbria, and, having encamped within two furlongs of Thyatira, where he lay intrenched, summoned him to deliver up the army, as having taken the command upon him against the known laws of Rome. Fimbria replied, that his authority was equally usurped: whereupon Sylla began to draw a trench, in order to besiege him in his camp, which Fimbria's men perceiving, they openly protested, that they would not by any means imbrue their hands in the blood of their fellow-citizens, and passed over in troops to Sylla. Fimbria, finding himself no-ways in a condition to oppose Sylla by force, had recourse to treachery, and suborned a slave to pass into Sylla's camp as a deserter, and there to stab him; but his heart failing him, and being suspected, by the fear he betrayed, to be sent on some such errand, he was apprehended; and, having openly owned the whole matter, Sylla's men were filled with such indignation, that it was no easy matter to keep them within the camp, every one desiring to revenge such an execrable piece of treachery with the death of the traitor. The plot being discovered, Fimbria, not trusting even his own troops, retired with a few of his friends to a strong fort, whence he invited Sylla to a parley. Sylla refused to see him, but sent one Rutilius in his stead to offer him a safe conduct to the sea-side, upon condition he resigned the troops under his command, and abandoned Asia. To this offer Fimbria made no other reply, than that he knew a more expeditious way to prevent bloodshed; and withdrawing in a violent passion, stole away to Pergamus, where he stabbed himself in the temple of Esculapius. But the wound not proving mortal, one of his servants dispatched him at his request, and afterwards killed himself. Sylla caused his body to be decently interred, which was so pleasing to his soldiery, that they came over to Sylla all to a man †.

Sylla, having now an uncontrouled power in Asia, declared the Chians, Rhodians, Lycians, Magnesiensians, and Trojans, whose city he rebuilt, a free people, and friends of the people of Rome, by way of reward for having sided with the Romans; but on the other cities he laid heavy fines, condemning them to pay in one year's time twenty thousand talents, and quartering his soldiers in the houses of such as had shewn any disaffection to the Romans. Each private man was to receive of his landlord sixteen drachmas a day, and each officer fifty; and besides were to be supplied with provisions, not only for their own sustenance, but to regale such of their friends as they should think fit to invite. By these impositions most of the inhabitants of Asia were reduced to beggary, especially the Ephesiensians, who had above others exerted their hatred against the Romans. The province of Asia being thus put out of a condition to revolt, Sylla, loaded with immense treasures, set sail for Italy, leaving behind him Lucullus with the character of quæstor, and Muræna with that of prætor (X). He consigned the two legions that had served served under Fimbria to Muræna, suspecting them inclined to Marius, whose faction he was going to quash at Rome.

(X) Amongst other things of great value, Sylla brought out of Asia several libraries, namely that of Aristotle, which he seized on upon the death of Apellicon the Teian, who had purchased it with an immense sum of money. Apellicon was one of the wealthiest men in Asia, and grudged laying out his money on any thing except books; but in these he was extravagant to a great degree, outbidding even kings when any valuable purchase offered; for which he ransacked all the public and private libraries of Asia, bribing with large sums the librarians to deliver to him by stealth such as were not to be sold. By this means he got a collection of all the most scarce and valuable books that could be purchased. However, like many in our days, he was more pleased with the sight, than the use of them. Having purchased of the heirs of Nileus Scepstus the libraries of Aristotle and Theophrastus, and finding many of the books composed by them greatly damaged and worm-eaten, he undertook to transcribe them, but was often mistaken in

Mithridates, returning into Pontus, reduced those nations which had revolted during the war, beginning with the Colchi, who, upon the approach of his army, offered to submit, provided he would appoint his son Mithridates king over them; which was no sooner granted, but they returned to their duty. This raised a diffidence in the king, as if his son's ambition had occasioned that revolt. Whereupon he kept him for some time bound with gold fetters, and afterwards put him to death, without any regard to his eminent services during the war<sup>8</sup>. The Bosphori likewise, a very warlike people, had shaken off the yoke, and, in order to reduce them, or at least under that pretence, he began to make such preparations both by sea and land, as raised no small jealousy in the Romans; the more, because he had not, according to the articles of agreement, resigned to Ariobarzanes the whole and intire possession of Cappadocia, but reserved to himself some places of great importance, and had complained of Archelaus, as if at his instigation he had granted more to Sylla than he ought to have done. This jealousy was encreased by the unexpected arrival of Archelaus, who dreading the effects of the king's displeasure, fled for refuge to Muræna, and, assuring him that those vast preparations were not designed against the Bosphori, prevailed upon him to be before-hand with the king in making war. Having therefore drawn together with all possible expedition his troops, he marched into Cappadocia with a design to invade Pontus. The king hearing of his motions, dispatched ambassadors to him to put him in mind of the articles of peace, which Sylla, whose prætor he was, had agreed to. Muræna, who was more inclined to war than peace, in hopes, as Appian informs us, of deserving a triumph, replied that he knew nothing of any such articles: for Sylla had set nothing down in writing, but contented himself with the execution of what had been agreed upon. Having dismissed the ambassadors with this answer, he began to lay waste in filling up the chasms, which made the books that were published by him be looked upon as less correct, though copied from the originals. As Apellicon died during the Mithridatic war, Sylla seized on all his books, and with them enriched his own library at Rome (36).

and plunder the country, without sparing even the temples, or the treasures consecrated to the gods. Having put all to fire and sword on the frontiers of Pontus towards Cappadocia, he passed the river Halys, and on that side possessed himself of four hundred villages belonging to the king, without the least opposition, Mithridates being unwilling to commit any hostilities before the return of the ambassadors, whom he had sent to Rome to complain both to the senate and to Sylla of such violent proceedings. The ambassadors returned at last, and with them one Callidius sent by the senate, who in a public assembly commanded Muræna to forbear molesting a friend and ally of the Roman people; but afterwards calling him aside, had a private conference with him, in which some writers suppose, as he brought no decree of the senate, that he encouraged him to pursue the war; at least he continued practising the same hostilities, and even made an attempt upon Sinope, the place where the king resided, and the royal treasures were kept. But as the town was well garisoned, he was forced to retire with some loss; and in the mean time Mithridates himself, taking the field, appeared at the head of a powerful army on the opposite banks of the river, which he passed in spite of all Muræna's efforts, drove the Romans from their camp, and forced them with great slaughter to save themselves over the mountains into Phrygia. This sudden and unexpected victory brought many of the cities of Asia again to side with Mithridates, who having driven the Romans quite out of Cappadocia, made a great fire on the top of a high hill, and offered after the manner of his country solemn sacrifices to Jupiter the powerful in war. But in the mean time Sylla being created dictator, and having got all the power into his own hands, he sent Aulus Gabinius into Asia to charge Muræna, in his name, to give over molesting Mithridates, whom he had honoured with the title of a friend and ally of Rome. No sooner was Sylla's pleasure known to Muræna, but he drew off his forces, and abandoned all the places he had taken after the departure of Sylla. He was soon after recalled, and M. Thermus appointed prætor of Asia in his room<sup>b</sup>. Gabinius was also charged to reconcile Mithridates and Ariobarzanes; which he did accordingly, Mithridates, giving to the Cappadocian his own son, about four years old, as an hostage. Muræna on his return to Rome was honoured with a triumph, and received with loud acclamations, as if he had performed great things.

of his sons, king of that country. From thence he led his army against the Achæans, a people bordering on the Colchi, and originally descended from the Greeks, who on their return from Troy, mistaking their way into Greece, had settled there. They opposed the king with great resolution, and obliged him to abandon the country with the loss of three parts of his army<sup>1</sup>. Being returned into Pontus he recruited his army, and made vast preparations with a design to invade them anew; but in the mean time Sylla dying, he altered his resolution, and unwilling to lose those countries, which he had delivered up agreeable to the articles of peace concluded with Sylla, determined to attempt at all adventures the recovery of them. Having therefore induced Tigranes king of Armenia, and his son-in-law, to invade Cappadocia, he himself, after performing solemn sacrifices to Jupiter and Neptune, entered Paphlagonia with an army of a hundred and twenty thousand foot trained up after the Roman discipline, sixteen thousand horse, and a hundred chariots armed with scythes. From Paphlagonia, which readily submitted to him, he marched into Bithynia, which had been lately bequeathed to the Romans by king Nicomedes. Neither did he meet here with any opposition, or in the province of Asia, which being oppressed with most exorbitant taxes, looked upon him as their deliverer. In entering the cities of Asia he made M. Marius or Varius, whom Sertorius had sent him from Spain to discipline and command his army, walk before him with the consular ensigns, as if he were the chief magistrate, the king following him like one of his attendants. He made several cities free, but at the same time acquainted them, that they were not indebted to him for their liberty, but to Sertorius. Thus by the connivance of Sertorius, who was a great opposer of Sylla's faction, many cities sided with the king, without knowing that they revolted from the Romans. At this time Julius Cæsar being at Rhodes, whither he had retired to apply himself at leisure to the study of oratory, under the discipline of Apollonius Molon, a most eminent teacher of that art, and hearing what havoc the king's officers made in the adjacent countries, gathered together what troops he could, and falling upon them drove them quite out of Asia, though he was then but in the twenty fifth year of his age<sup>2</sup>.

By this time the senate being apprized of the king's designs, and finding a new war unavoidable, appointed Lucullus, Lucullus sent against Mithridates who was then consul, and having been Sylla's legate in Asia,

was well acquainted with the country, to manage it (Y). Cotta, the other consul prevailed upon the senate with much importunity to be likewise employed in that war, and was sent with a fleet to guard the Propontis and defend Bithynia<sup>1</sup>. Lucullus having raised one legion in Italy passed over with it into Asia, where he was joined by four others, two of which, as they had served under Fimbria, in a manner uncontrouled, proved at first very mutinous and refractory; the other two were not much better having been long inured to the luxury of Asia. The disciplining of these troops kept Lucullus some time in a state of inactivity, while all the states of Asia were up in arms, and ready to shake off the Roman yoke, being on one hand harassed in a most extraordinary manner by the collectors, and on the other invited with great promises to join Mithridates, who was advancing with two very numerous armies, and a fleet of four hundred ships of thirty oars, besides a great many smaller vessels, called penteconteri and cercuræ. One of these armies was ordered to march under the conduct of Diophantus Matharus, into Cappadocia, and oppose Lucullus, if he offered to enter Pontus on that side. the other consisting of one hundred and fifty thousand foot, twelve thousand horse, and a hundred chariots armed with scythes, Mithridates commanded in person. He had also a third army encamped in the neighbourhood of Heraclea in Pontus and commanded by Marius and Eumachus, two generals of great experience in war. Lucullus, hearing that the king's fleet was out, commanded Cotta to keep his, which was inferior in number, within the harbour of Chalcedon while he advanced by land to engage Mithridates. Cotta followed his injunctions in not venturing out with the fleet, but, at the same time, drawing together what troops he could, he resolved to be before-hand with him in fighting Mithridates, not doubting in the least of the victory. And very unluckily for him it happened, that Mithridates bent his rout to Chalcedon; which Cotta no sooner heard, but he sent P. Rutilius his legate with a considerable body to observe his motions. Rutilius was met on his march by Marius and Eumachus, and not declining the engagement, most part of his army was cut in pieces, and he himself slain. The same misfortune befel several other officers of distinction sent out to oppose Mithridates, who, being elated with such success, ordered his admiral to sail into the very harbour, and fire the Roman fleet; which he did accordingly, without meeting with the least opposition either from Cotta or Nudus his admiral, who kept close within the walls of the town, and tamely beheld the enemy burning some of his ships, sinking others, and carrying away the rest, to the number of sixty. The loss of the Romans on this occasion was very considerable. Plutarch tells us, that Cotta lost in the land engagements four thousand foot<sup>m</sup>, and that few of the mariners were saved. Memnon says, that both the sea and land were covered with the dead bodies of the Romans, eight thousand of them being slain in the sea-engagement, and four thousand five hundred taken prisoners, and five thousand three hundred of the land-forces, all Italians, being either killed or taken prisoners; whereas Mithridates lost in all but seven hundred and thirty men<sup>n</sup> (Z).

THIS victory and the bad consequences that attended it, most cities of Asia being ready to revolt, made Lucullus hasten his march. When he came in sight of the king's army, he was surprised to see so numerous a body; and having with him but thirty thousand foot and two thousand five hundred horse, he thought it was most adviseable to decline an engagement; however, there happened frequent skirmishes between the Roman and Pontic cavalry, wherein the former gained no small advantages; which so raised their spirits, a little before quite sunk, that Lucullus had much ado to keep them within the trenches, so eager were they for a general engagement.

(Z) This is the victory which Mithridates brags of in a letter to A. Iaces, thus; I have entirely defeated M. Cotta the Roman general near Chalcedon, and stripped him of his fleet in a sea fight (38).

(A). Mithridates finding that he could not draw Lucullus to a battle, and being loth to spend the summer, after so great preparations, without doing any thing, silently decamped in the dead of the night, and by break of day reached the mountain Adrastia or Dindymus, which commanded the city of Cyzicum. This city was the key of Asia, and greatly addicted to the Romans. In the overthrow of Chalcedon they lost three thousand citizens and ten of their best ships, and had on all occasions shewn an unalterable attachment to the Roman interest. Mithridates, hoping either to get possession of so important a place, or to draw Lucullus to an engagement, if he offered to relieve it, began the siege, and invested the city with his whole army by land, and four hundred ships by sea. Lucullus having timely notice of the king's retreat, followed him close, and falling upon his rear, killed ten thousand of his men, and took thirteen thousand prisoners. After this victory, to encourage the *Cyziceni*ans, he encamped on a rising ground in sight of the town ; but Mithridates, giving out that Lucullus was at a great distance, and those they saw were supplies sent him by Tigranes, they began to be anxious about the Romans, and continued in great apprehension, till one of Lucullus's men, swimming in the night through the enemies fleet, got into the city and undeceived them. He delivered to the magistrates a letter from Lucullus, wherein he acquainted them with his late victory, and assured them, that he would not fail to relieve them °. Lucullus, in taking a view of the ground where the enemy was encamped, observed a mountain, by the gaining of which he might easily cut off their communication with the country, and prevent their having any provisions but what were brought by sea ; but as there was only one way leading to it, and that very narrow, and guarded by a strong body of the king's forces, he had laid aside all thoughts of so hazardous an attempt, when he was advised by a messenger from L. Manius or Magius, whom Sertorius had sent to conclude a treaty of friendship and alliance between him and Mithridates, to remove his camp to the above-mentioned hill, and acquainted, that Manius had persuaded the king to withdraw his forces from the narrow passes, and suffer him to encamp where-ever he pleased : and truly Manius had made the king believe, that the Fimbrian legions, which had formerly served under Sertorius, were in a day or two to come over to him, and advised him not to oppose the Romans if they offered to pass the streights, which would cost him much blood, since he was sure of the victory without striking a blow. The king, not suspecting any treachery, hearkened to his advice, and even sent out a strong party to meet the Fimbrian legions, which, according to agreement, made a shew as if they intended to join him ; but, as the party drew near, the legions unexpectedly falling upon them, cut them in pieces all to a man <sup>P</sup>. Thus Lucullus gained that important post, and having cut off the enemy's communication with the country, was supplied in great plenty with all manner of provisions, while they had nothing to depend upon but their fleet, which, as the winter was drawing near, could hardly supply with provisions so numerous an army. This made Mithridates double his efforts to reduce the town, which he battered night and day with engines of a new invention, which did great execution (B) ; but the citizens were no less active in defending it, repairing with indefatigable labour by night the breaches made by the king's engines in the day-time. The king finding that it was in vain to batter the walls began to undermine them ; but in this too his efforts were unsuccessful, and he was near being taken

(B) Among other engines, Nicodemes a Thessalian contrived one called helepolis, about one hundred cubits high. Upon this they planted a tower stored with all manner of machines for throwing stones of a vast size, which so battered the walls, that the citizens were obliged to labour all night in repairing them. This fatigue they could not have long endured, but a sudden storm of wind arising, the helepolis was blown down, and the machines planted on the tower rendered unerviceable ; which proved a great relief to them (41).

in one of his mines by the counter-mines of the city. In the mean time winter coming on, the king's army was so distressed for want of provisions, that many died for hunger, and those that lived were forced to feed on the flesh of their dead companions. The famine was followed by a plague, which daily swept away great numbers; insomuch, that Mithridates, having now lost all hopes of reducing the city, began to think only of a retreat, which it was no easy matter to effectuate, most of his ships being shattered by storms, and all the passes by land blocked up by the Romans (C). The first opportunity that offered was the departure of Lucullus, gone with a strong detachment to besiege a castle at some distance. The king laying hold of this occasion, sent away the best part of his horse by night, ordering them not to halt till they were out of the reach of the enemy; but Lucullus, receiving timely notice of their march, hastened back, and with ten companies of foot and all his horse, pursued them so close, notwithstanding the excessive cold and deep

(C) Plutarch Appian, Julius Obsequens, and others tell us, that Mithridates was greatly terrified by the following prodigy, which was related and believed, both by the *Cyziceni*ans and the king's army. In the city they used yearly to sacrifice a black heifer to Proserpine; but that year the town being blocked up on all sides, they made one of dough, and brought it to the altar. They no sooner began the ceremony, but the true heifer which was designed for Proserpine's festival, and was grazing on the other side of the gulf, threw herself into the sea, and swimming through the enemies fleet, got safe to the mouth of the harbour; there she dived under the chain that obstructed the entry, and passing through the middle of the city, went strait to Proserpine's temple, and presented herself before the altar, where she was sacrificed (42). The same authors add, that Proserpine appearing in the night-time to Aristagoras, the chief magistrate of the city, told him, that she had provided a piper against the pipers, or, as Plutarch has it, a Libyan piper against the Pontic trumpeter. This at first seemed a riddle to the *Cyziceni*ans; but in the mean time a violent wind blowing from Lybia, which dispersed the king's fleet, and overturned all his engines, they understood the mysterious saying of the goddess. It was also said, that Minerva appeared to many in the city of Troy, dropping with sweat, shewing part of her veil tore, and telling them, that she was going to succour the *Cyziceni*ans. The Trojans, as Plutarch informs us, used to shew the pillars, whereon decrees and letters concerning this miraculous event were engraved.

snow, in which many of his men perished, that he came up with them as they were passing the river Rhyndacus, took six hundred horse, with all the beasts of burthen, fifteen thousand men, and put the rest to the sword, most of their horses having died on their march, but a very few got safe into Bithynia. On his return he fell in with Aristonicus the king's admiral, whom he took prisoner, as he was upon the point of putting to sea with a large sum of money to inveigle the Roman army, which he also seized<sup>9</sup>. The king's army before Cyzicum being now extremely weakened by the plague, famine, and daily losses, the inhabitants so harassed them with frequent sallies, that Mithridates determined to break up the siege, and return with part of his forces by sea, while the others marched by land, under the conduct of Manius and Hermæus, whom Sertorius had sent to head the king's troops. Accordingly the king, in the dead of the night, embarked, and at the same time Manius and Hermæus marched off with thirty thousand men, making the best of their way to Lamp-sacus; but were overtaken by Lucullus at the river Æsopus, which at that time was not fordable, being greatly swelled by the heavy rains. Twenty thousand were killed on the spot, eleven thousand of which were said to have been sent by Sertorius; nor could one man have escaped, had not the Romans given over the pursuit to gather the gold and silver, which by the advice of their generals, well acquainted with the Roman avarice, they had scattered about on the road, on purpose to retard their pursuit<sup>r</sup>. Lucullus on his return entered Cyzicum, among the loud acclamations of the citizens, who afterwards instituted public sports in honour of him, which they called Lucullea. The city he declared free, and the senate heaped upon the inhabitants all the privileges, immunities, and exemptions which were enjoyed by the natives of Rome itself. Plutarch and Appian<sup>s</sup> tell us, that Mithridates lost in all before Cyzicum three hundred thousand men, which is also confirmed by Orosius<sup>t</sup>. Strabo says, that the king's army consisted but of one hundred and fifty thousand men<sup>u</sup>, of which one hundred thousand, according to Eutropius perished in the siege<sup>w</sup>. The king himself, in a letter to Arfaces, writes, that he was forced to raise the siege of Cyzicum, not on account of any great loss he had sustained, or for fear of the enemy, but because he could have no provisions, the country being laid waste all round, partly by his own forces, and partly by the enemies*.

FROM Cyzicum Lucullus marched with his army along the coast of the Hellepont, and arriving at Troas, equipped his fleet there, and put to sea in chace of Manius Alexander, and Dionysius, three of the king's generals, who were roving up and down the sea, with a fleet of fifty ships, and ten thousand land-forces on board (D). He came up with them near the island of Lemnos, took thirty two of the king's ships, and put great part of the land-forces to the sword. The day after the engagement the three generals were discovered in a cave where they had concealed themselves, and dragged from thence to Lucullus, who, after having severely upbraided Manius for fighting against his country, caused him to be put to death. Before the battle, he had given orders to his soldiers not to kill any that had but one eye, meaning Manius, who had lost an eye, not that he designed to save him, but because he was willing to reproach him with his ignominious behaviour before he put him to death. Alexander and Dionysius were reserved for the triumph; but the latter prevented that disgrace by a dose of poison†. From Lemnos Lucullus steered his course to Bithynia, upon intelligence that Mithridates had appeared with his fleet on those coasts; but the king having timely notice of his design, made what haste he could to gain Pontus and arrived at Heraclea on board of a pirate, by name Selemus, with whom he was forced to trust himself, his fleet being dispersed by a violent storm, and the ship that carried him cast away (E).

that is, Why do you sleep, stout lion, while the fawns are so near you? The same authors add, that while he was relating his dream to his friends, news was brought him, that thirteen of the king's ships had appeared off of Troy, steering their course to Lemnos; whereupon he immediately set sail, took all the ships, and killed Isodorus the king's admiral.

WHILE Lucullus was thus chasing Mithridates out of the sea, his commanders were no less successful by land. Triarius, sent by him to besiege Apamea, reduced that place. From Apamea he marched to Pesura, situated near mount Olympus, which he took by storm, and plundered. The strong and important city of Prusa likewise submitted to the conqueror, after having obliged the king's garison to withdraw. Nicæa followed the example of the others, the Pontics having abandoned the city on the first news of the approach of the Romans<sup>2</sup>. From Prusias Triarius marched with all possible expedition to join Cotta, who lay encamped near Nicomedia, where the king himself at that time resided; but before the two armies were joined, Mithridates found means to make his escape, first to Heraclea, which was betrayed to him by one Lamachus, and thence to Sinope (F).

Lucullus, having now reduced all Paphlagonia and Bithynia, marched through Cappadocia, and joined Cotta and Tri- failing to Pontus, and that he lost in both wrecks sixty ships, and ten thousand men. Mithridates himself, in a letter to Arfaces, says, that he lost the flower of his troops by two shipwrecks, the one at Para, the other at Heraclea (44). Orosius tells us, that while Mithridates was sailing against Byzantium, (whither, Eutropius says, he was chased by Lucullus) he lost by a sudden storm eighty ships armed with brazen beaks, and many of his men; and Florus, that his whole fleet, with all manner of stores for the Pontic war, was dispersed, and one hundred ships lost.

(F) Lamachus was the chief magistrate of Heraclea; but being bribed with a large sum, promised to deliver up the city to Mithridates; and accordingly having invited the citizens to a very magnificent entertainment without the walls of the town, while they were in the height of their revels, privately acquainted Mithridates, that the gates were open, and none of the citizens in a condition to oppose him. The king arrived the same night, and entering the city without opposition, secured it with a garison of four thousand men, under the command of Connacoriges, an officer of great experience. Next day he summoned the magistrates, and in a friendly manner encouraged them to stand by him, since he had no other design in what he had done but to protect them against the Romans (45).

rius at Nicomedia, with a design to invade Pontus; but hearing that Heraclea was in the king's hands, and supposing that the citizens had submitted to him of their own accord, he altered his plan, and detached Cotta against Heraclea. Triarius was ordered with the fleet to the Hellepont and Propontis, to intercept the king's fleet, which was daily expected from Spain with new supplies from Sertorius. Lucullus himself, with the main strength of the army, pursued his march into Pontus <sup>2</sup>. His army was greatly harassed, especially in the narrow passes between Cappadocia and Pontus, by flying parties of the enemy; but more for want of provisions, the country being all about laid waste by the king's troops; in-somuch, that Lucullus, having lost almost all his beasts of burthen, was obliged to take along with the army thirty thousand Galatians, each of them carrying a sack of corn on his back. At last he gained the plains of Pontus, a rich country and so stored with all manner of provisions, that an ox was sold in the camp for a drachma, and every thing else as cheap in proportion. Lucullus having refreshed his soldiers, and finding no army of the king's in the field, divided his forces, and at the same time invested Amisus, a very strong town; Eupatoria, which Mithridates had built and made the place of his residence, and Themiscyra, situated on the banks of the river Thermodon; Eupatoria was soon taken; but Themiscyra made a vigorous resistance. The townsmen gauled the Romans with their engines to such a degree, that not daring to approach the walls openly, they contented themselves with undermining them; but in this too they met with no small difficulty from the enemy, who often engaged them under ground, and let into their mines bears and other wild beasts, with swarms of bees, which obliged them to abandon their works; however, the town was at last obliged to surrender for want of provisions, and the hard duty, which the Romans had undergone with great cheerfulness, was rewarded with a rich booty. As for the city of Amisus, Lucullus himself sat down before it; but as the town was very strong in itself, and defended by a numerous garison, the flower of the king's troops, he thought it adviseable to spare his men, and reduce it by famine; and on this occasion it was that the Romans first complained of their general, as if he spun out the war, on purpose to be continued in the command of the army; which charge, as we shall afterwards see, was not quite groundless. While he lay before Amisus, Mithridates advancing to Cabira, a city not far distant from Amisus, was there joined by forty thousand foot and four thousand horse. Lucullus hearing of the king's approach, left Muræna, the son of that Muræna whom Sylla had appointed prætor of Asia, with two legions to continue the siege, and marched himself with the rest of the army thro' the mountains to meet the king (G). Mithridates had placed one Phænix of the blood royal with a considerable body in the narrow passes, injoining him to give notice by fires of the approach of Lucullus, and defend the straits till he came up with his whole army to relieve him; but Phænix was so far from opposing Lucullus, that he joined him; however, the king, being by other parties informed of the enemy's motions, passed the river Lycus, and meeting Lucullus in the champain country, proffered him battle, which he declined at first, but was soon after drawn to a general engagement of the horse, wherein the Romans were driven back to the mountains with considerable loss, Pompeius, or, as some call him, Pomponius, general of their horse, being taken, and many officers of great distinction killed on the spot (H). Mithridates, flushed with this success, drew up his army in battalia for several days successively; but finding that Lucullus kept on the mountains, he began to make the necessary dispositions for marching up to him; which Lucullus fearing decamped in the night-time, and being conducted by one Apollodorus a Greek, whom he found with others of the same nation concealed in a cave, got through the mountains, and by break of day

(G) Tully, in his oration for this Muræna, tells us, that he was legate to Lucullus during the Mithridatic war, that he led armies, fought battles, defeated the enemy's forces, besieged and took many towns; that he so behaved himself in Asia, at that time a rich country, and greatly corrupted with luxury, as not to betray the least inclination to avarice or luxury; and that he performed many noble exploits without the general's assistance, but the general none without his (46).

(H) Pompeius being brought to Mithridates dangerously wounded, the king asked him, whether he would become his friend, if he granted him his life? Pompeius answered, that he should be his friend, if he concluded a peace with the people of Rome; but if he persisted to make war upon them, he should continue to be his enemy. This answer provoked the barbarians to such a degree, that they would have cut him in pieces, had not the king protected him, saying, that he would not suffer cruelty to be practised upon valour, merely because unfortunate (47).

N n pitched

pitched his camp on a rising ground near the city of Cabira, where he well knew the enemy could not force him to an engagement <sup>b</sup>. Mithridates followed him, and encamped at a small distance ; but thought it adviseable not to attack him in his camp. While both armies were in this posture, a party from the king's camp passing close to that of the Romans in pursuit of a deer, some Roman soldiers running out, stopped their chace. This bred a quarrel, and many flocking from both camps to relieve their companions, the Romans were forced to give way ; which Lucullus observing, went out alone to meet them, and having stopped the foremost in the flight, marched back with them against the enemy, whom he put to flight, and pursued to the very camp, fighting himself the whole time in the first rank. On his return to the camp, he stripped those who had fled of their arms, and commanded them, according to his custom, to dig a trench twelve foot wide, the rest of the army standing by and looking on <sup>c</sup>.

BUT now provisions grew very scarce in the Roman camp, which obliged Lucullus to divide his army, and detach great parties into Cáppadocia, the only place from whence he could have supplies. Taxiles and Diophantus, two of the king's generals, were encamped on the frontiers of that country, in order to cut off its communication with the Romans. These suffered Adrianus with a considerable body of foot to enter Cappadocia, in hopes of intercepting him and the convoys on his return ; which they might easily have done, had they fallen upon him in the plain country ; but as they attacked him in the straits of the mountains, where there was no room for their horse to engage, they were utterly routed, first on the mountains, and then in the plains, where there ensued a bloody engagement, the Romans being reinforced with a fresh body from the camp, and the king's men fighting with great courage and resolution, till their commanders disheartened them by their flight. The king, upon the news of this defeat, resolved to break up his camp and retire, not questioning but Lucullus, upon the return of his troops, would attack him. This resolution he no sooner imparted to his nobles, but they began privately to send away their most valuable goods ; which the soldiers finding out, and taking it unkindly that no notice had been given them, plundered their baggage, and put those that escorted them to the sword. On this occasion Dorylaus, one of the king's generals, was killed for a purple garment which he wore, and Hermæus, a famous soothsayer, trod to death in the crowd. After this the soldiers betook themselves to a precipitous flight, crowding out of the gates in the utmost confusion, which the king perceiving, hastened to stop their flight; but no one shewing him the least respect, he was carried away with the crowd, and falling down, was very near being trod to death <sup>d</sup> in the throng. Being thus forsaken by his army, he retired with a small retinue, first to Cabira, and thence into Armenia to Tigranes his son-in-law (I), and not into Iberia, as is falsely related by Josephus <sup>e</sup>. Lucullus having at the same time received news of the victory of his parties, and of the disorderly flight of the enemy, sent the best part of his horse to pursue them, and himself marched against those, who not having time to make their escape, had remained in the camp, and had put themselves in a posture of defence. These he surrounded with his legions, but most of them made their escape, the Romans being busied, contrary to the general's orders, in plundering the camp, where they found a rich booty. Having taken the camp, Lucullus made what haste he could in pursuit of the king, who being overtaken by a company of Galatians, caused a mule loaded with part of his treasures to be driven in amongst them, and made his escape while they were intent upon the booty, and quarrelling among themselves <sup>f</sup> (K) about the division of the spoils. Mithridates, remembering in his flight, that he had left his sisters, wives and concubines, at Pharnacia, dispatched Bacchus, or Bacchides, an eunuch, with orders to put them all to death, lest they

(K) Of the king's escape Tully writes thus: Mithridates, in his flight out of Pontus, left behind a great deal of gold and silver, part whereof he had received of his ancestors, and part raked together during his first war in Asia, and carried into his own kingdom. Lucullus, finding it was in vain to pursue Mithridates any farther, returned to his camp, and thence marched against the city of Cabira, which surrendered upon conditions. The example of Cabira was followed by most of the strong holds of Pontus, the king's governors flocking from all parts to tender their service to the conqueror. Among these was the grandfather of Strabo the geographer, whom the king had disobliged, by putting to death Tibias, his cousin-german, and his son Theophilus. He was a man of such credit, that it was no sooner heard he had abandoned the king's party, but fifteen other commanders delivered up to Lucullus the places which they had been intrusted with <sup>s</sup>. And thus was Pontus, hitherto inaccessible to any enemy, laid open to the Roman legions <sup>b</sup> (M). At the same time Triarius, who was sent, as we have mentioned above, to intercept the king's fleet, obtained a complete victory near the island of Tenedos, where he either took or sunk sixty ships, whereby the great fleet which the king had brought with him into Asia was intirely destroyed.

(M) Mithridates, in a letter to Arfaces, puts this varnish upon his flight : “ I recruited my army, says he, at Cabira, and after many sharp engagements between the Romans and me, we were both distressed for want of provisions. Cotta

Cotta was all this time employed in the siege of Heraclea, and had made but small progress. He made several assaults ; but was always repulsed with great loss. His engines did no execution on the walls, which so incensed him, that he caused most of them to be burnt, and the engineer who contrived them to be put to death. After this, leaving part of his army before the town, to prevent their receiving any supplies, he encamped in the Lycæan fields, a plentiful country, with a design to refresh his army, and return before the town, which was now reduced to great straits for want of provisions, and on account of the intestine quarrels between the townsmen and the garison. Having refreshed his soldiers, he returned to the siege ; but found the town plentifully supplied by sea with all manner of necessaries, and in a better condition to hold out a long siege, than it was when he first invested it. Hereupon, despairing ever to reduce it alone, he sent orders to Triarius to assist him with his fleet, and block up the city by sea, as he had done by land. Triarius was very willing to undertake this task, being now quite disengaged ; and having on his first arrival defeated the Heraclæan fleet, brought the town in a few months to such straits, that the third part of the garison died for hunger ; whereupon Conacorex, governor of the place, resolved to purchase his own safety at the expence of the townsmen, and marching out in the night-time, as he had agreed with Triarius, delivered one of the gates to the Romans, who, entering the city Heraclea sword in hand, exercised all manner of cruelty on the abandoned and helpless inhabitants. Cotta, who lay encamped at some distance from the city, hearing it was taken and plundered by Triarius (for Conacorex had not imparted his design to him, knowing he was a man not to be relied on) flew into a passion at seeing himself bereaved both of the rich booty, and the glory of reducing a place which had kept him employed two whole years, and marching in all haste to the city, fell upon the Romans, who were busy in plundering, which would have occasioned a great deal of bloodshed, had not Triarius interposed, and put an end to the scuffle, by promising Cotta and his men an equal share of the booty. Conacorex, after marching out of Heraclea, to conceal his treachery, seized on two forts belonging to the Romans, Teium and Amastus ; which Triarius being sent to recover, Cotta, in his absence, plundered the city anew, rifled and stripped the temples, which the other had spared, put all the citizens he could meet to the sword, and having secured on board of his ships all the statues, pictures, gold and silver vessels of the temples, all the rich furniture of the private houses, and whatever whatever else was worth carrying away, for his last farewell commanded his soldiers to set fire to the city in several places, which in a short time reduced it to a heap of ashes. Thus was Heraclea, one of the richest and most famous cities of Pontus, taken, after having held out a siege of two years <sup>i</sup>. Conacorex delivered the two places he had seized to Triarius, who suffered him to retire without molestation. And Cotta, having no further use for his troops, dismissed the auxiliaries, resigned the legions to Lucullus, and himself put to sea with his fleet on his return to Rome; but he had scarce got out of the harbour, when part of his ships, being over-freighted with the spoils of the city, sunk; and the others were by a violent north wind dashed against the shore, which occasioned the loss of great part of the booty <sup>k</sup>. On his return to Rome he was highly applauded by the senate, and honoured with the title of Ponticus.

taken.

Lucullus having now reduced Pontus, marched against the Chaldeans, Tibarenians, and the inhabitants of Armenia Minor, who, of their own accord, submitted, and put him in possession of all their strong holds. From Armenia he led his forces to the sea-side, and returned before Amisus, which still held out, Callimachus, governor of the place, having harassed the Romans, with engines of his own contriving, to such a degree, that they had given over assaulting the town, and contented themselves with blocking it up by land, tho' the garison was at the same time supplied with all manner of provisions by sea. Lucullus, on his arrival, summoned the garison to surrender, and offered them very honourable terms; which they refusing to comply with, after encouraging his soldiers, he made a general assault at the time when Callimachus used to draw off great part of his troops to give them some respite. The Romans applying their scaling ladders, got over the wall before Callimachus could come to the assistance of those he had left to guard it; however, by setting the city on fire, he found means in that confusion to make his escape. Lucullus, out of pity to the perishing city, commanded part of his men to stand to their arms, and the others to use their utmost endeavours in quenching the fire; but the soldiers neglecting the houses, saved only the furniture, and such things as they could carry off, whereby the city was in great part destroyed, to the grief of Lucullus, who designed to save it, and shew the same favour to the Amisians, that Sylla had done to the Athenians. The fire was at last quenched by a violent and unexpected shower; and Lucullus having, with much ado, restrained his soldiers from committing any further hostilities on the citizens, repaired the city in great measure before he left it, and suffered the inhabitants peaceably to enjoy their houses and lands <sup>1</sup>. Some years after Lucullus having besieged Nisibis, or, as the Greeks call it, Antiochia Mygdonica, defended likewise by Callimachus, under Guras, brother to Tigranes king of Armenia, would hearken to no conditions, till Callimachus was delivered up to him; and having him in his power, revenged the destruction of Amisus with his death, notwithstanding he offered to discover great sums of money concealed under ground, if he would grant him his life <sup>m</sup>.

AND now Lucullus having reduced all Pontus, and made it a province of the Roman empire, and settled all Asia with excellent laws, sent Appius Claudius, his wife's brother, ambassador into Armenia, to demand of Tigranes the delivery of Mithridates, as belonging to his triumph; and in case of refusal, to proclaim war against him. From the time Mithridates had sheltered himself in Armenia, Tigranes, his son-in-law, had promised to protect his person, and had not been wanting in any duties of hospitality; but could by no means ever be prevailed upon to see him, or treat with one who had lost so great a kingdom (N). To this embassy Tigranes replied, that he was far from approving the conduct of Mithridates; but however, as he was so nearly related to him, the demand of the Romans seemed pretty extraordinary, neither could he with any reputation comply with it, since all the world would look upon him as a very mean-spirited prince, if he should, for fear of an enemy, deliver up to punishment his father-in-law. Having with this answer dismissed the Roman ambassador, he sent for Mithridates, and condescended to see him for the first time, after he had resided a year and eight months in his dominions. In a private conference held by the two kings, it was agreed, that Tigranes should march against the Romans, and Mithridates with ten thousand horse return into Pontus, and, levying there what forces he could, rejoin Tigranes, before Lucullus, who was then employed at the siege of Sinope, could enter Armenia; but in the mean time Sinope (O) having surrendered, Lucullus, with all possible expedition, marched against Tigranes, and having drawn him to a general engagement, entirely defeated his army before he was joined by Mithridates, who heard the first news of his overthrow as he was marching with a considerable body to his assistance. Soon after he met Tigranes himself, flying

(O) Sinope was held by a body of Cilicians of the king's party, commanded by one Cleochares, as Orosius calls him, or Bacchis, as Strabo names him. Cleochares finding the city reduced to great straits, massacred most of the citizens, plundered the city, and set it on fire, retiring in the night-time with the spoils to the inner part of Pontus, inhabited by the Sanegians and Lazians. Lucullus observing the town all in a flame, and not doubting but the Cilicians had abandoned it, commanded the soldiers to scale the walls; and having entered the town without opposition, put to the sword eight thousand of the king's party, who had not had time to embark with the others. The fire was with much ado quenched by the Romans, and the citizens not only spared, but, as they were well affected to the republic, restored to the quiet possession of their lands and houses, and declared a free people (53). Plutarch and Appian inform us, that Lucullus was moved by a vision to shew so great favour to the city of Sinope; for as he was sleeping, say they, in his tent, one appearing to him, spoke these words; Go forward, Lucullus, for Autolychus is coming to meet you. When he awaked, he observed the city in a flame; and tho' he did not understand the meaning of the words he had heard, yet he advanced to the walls; and having taken the city, found on the shore, whither he pursued the Cilicians, a statue of exquisite workmanship, carefully wrapped up, and bound with cords, which the enemy had not been able to ship off, as they intended to do, had not Lucullus, awaked by this vision, pursued them so close. When the statue was unfolded, Lucullus was not a little surprised to find it resembling in every feature the person that had appeared to him in his dream; and, upon examination, learnt, that it was the statue of Autolychus, founder of Sinope. When Lucullus heard this, he recollected, say our authors, what Sylla had left in his commentaries, viz. that nothing is more certain, or more to be relied upon, than dreams (54). This statue, which was the work of Stbenides, Lucullus carried along with him, and a curious sphere made by Billarus. All other ornaments and things of value he restored to their lawful owners.

with a small retinue to shelter himself in some remote corner of his kingdom. Mithridates encouraged him to raise new forces, not questioning but another campaign would repair all the former losses, provided he would commit to his charge the whole management of the war; which Tigranes agreeing to, as thinking him more fit to deal with the Romans than himself, orders were issued out for raising a new army, and all the Armenians able to bear arms summoned to meet at the place of the general rendezvous. Out of these Mithridates chose seventy thousand foot and thirty five thousand horse, and having trained them up during the winter, after the Roman discipline, in the beginning of the spring he left part of them with Tigranes, and marched himself with the rest into Pontus, where he recovered many important places, and overcame in a pitched battle M. Fabius, whom Lucullus had appointed governor of that province <sup>a</sup>(P). Being flushed with this success, as soon as the wounds he received in the engagement suffered him to move, he pursued Fabius, and besieged him in the city of Cabira, whither he had retired; but in the mean time Triarius, who was marching out of Asia to join Lucullus, hearing what distress the Romans were in, hastened to their relief, and appearing unexpectedly on the neighbouring hills, struck such terror into the enemy that they raised the siege, and made the best of their way into Cappadocia. Triarius pursued them, and got so near them as to be parted only by a river. Here he halted, with a design to pass the river after he had allowed his men some rest; for they were tired out with long

(P) This victory he gained by the treachery of the Thracians that served under Fabius, and of the slaves that followed the Roman camp; for Fabius marching carelessly and in disorder, upon the report of some Thracian scouts, that the king was at a great distance, fell in with him unawares, and at the same time the Thracians revolting, he was obliged to retire with the loss of five hundred men. In his retreat the slaves, who were very numerous in the Roman camp, being inticed by Mithridates with hopes of their liberty and great rewards, fell unexpectedly on the Romans, who would have been all cut in pieces, had not the king himself fallen from his horse, having received two dangerous wounds, one on the knee with a stone, the other under his eye with a dart; for while the enemy were busy in carrying him off, the Romans, laying hold of that opportunity, retired unmolested (55).

But Mithridates was before-hand with him, and crossing the river on a bridge, where he had placed a strong guard, attacked the Romans with great resolution, before they had time to refresh themselves. The battle was bloody and the event doubtful, till the bridge breaking down with the weight of the multitude that passed, the king's troops who had engaged, relying chiefly on their numbers, began to lose courage, seeing they could receive no further assistance; and the Romans charging them with fresh vigour, they betook themselves to a precipitate flight. After this engagement, as winter came on, both armies were glad to retire to their winter-quarters<sup>o</sup>.

DURING the winter Mithridates raised new forces, and having received considerable supplies from Tigranes, took the field early in the spring, in hopes of driving the Romans quite out of Pontus, before Lucullus, who had work enough on his hands in Armenia, could come to their assistance. With this view he marched straight against Triarius and Sornatius, to whom Lucullus had committed the care and defence of that province; and finding them encamped near the city of Gaziurfa, proffered them battle; which they declining he sent a strong detachment to besiege a castle where the Romans had left all their baggage, hoping they would rather venture an engagement to relieve the place, than lose all they had got with so much toil and labour during the war; neither was he disappointed in his hopes; for tho' Triarius was for keeping close in his camp till the arrival of Lucullus, whom he daily expected, having acquainted him with his danger, the soldiers hearing that the castle was besieged, declared in a tumultuous manner, that if he did not lead them, they would march to the relief of the place without his leave. Triarius being thus forced, not by the enemy, but his own men, to fight, drew out his forces against the king, whose army was three times his number; but while they were upon the point of engaging, both armies were by a violent storm forced to retire to their respective camps; but Triarius receiving that very day intelligence of the approach of Lucullus, and fearing he would snatch the victory out of his hands, resolved to make a bold push, and next morning by break of day attack the king in his camp. If he conquered, the glory, he thought, would be intirely his own; if he were overcome, the enemy could reap no great advantage from his victory, Lucullus being at hand with a powerful army.

The king, in that surprise, putting himself at the head of a few troops of his guards, sustained the brunt of the Romans, till the rest of his army drawing up, came to his relief, and attacked the enemy with such fury, that the Roman foot was forced to give way, and was driven into a morass, where they were surrounded, and great numbers of them cut in pieces. Their horse were likewise put to flight, and pursued with great slaughter, till a Roman centurion in the king's service, pitying his country-men, attempted to kill him. The king's life was saved by his breast-plate; but as he received a deep wound in the thigh, he was obliged to give over the pursuit, himself, and those that were about him caused the retreat to be sounded, which, as it was unexpected, occasioned a great confusion in the whole army. The centurion was immediately cut in pieces; but the Roman horse in the mean time, getting the start of the enemy, found means to make their escape. Above seven thousand of the Romans were killed in that battle, and among them one hundred and fifty centurions, and twenty four tribunes, the greatest number of officers that had been lost in any engagement to that day. Mithridates, being cured of his wound, that he might not for the future be exposed to such dangers, caused all the Romans that served in his army to be formed into one body, as if they were to be sent out on a party, and then ordered them to retire to their tents, where they were all to a man cut in pieces <sup>P</sup> (Q).

(Q) Appian says, that this battle happened near mount Scotius, a place, says he, ever memorable for the victory of Mithridates, and defeat of the Romans (56). Hirtius likewise, in his commentaries on the war of Alexandria, mentions this overthrow of the Romans, and tells us, that it happened at a place about three miles distant from the town of Zela in Pontus. Tully, in his oration for the Manilian law, which he pronounced about half a year after that misfortune befel the Roman army, speaks of it thus: "The army was courageous and victorious; but Mithridates fell upon them. Suffer me in this place, like those who write of the Roman affairs, to pass over in silence the misfortunes, which were so great, that Lucullus received not the tidings of them by any messenger from the fight, but by common fame and report." And in another place of the same oration, "Having received that overthrow in Pontus, says he, which I put you in mind of against my will, our friends and allies being terrified,

THE king, however elated with success, yet would not engage Lucullus; but with long marches hastened into Armenia Minor, and encamped upon a hill near the town of Talura, expecting Tigranes, who was advancing with a strong army to join him. Lucullus, in pursuit of Mithridates, marched over the field of battle, leaving those unburied who had fallen in the engagement, which was the first thing that alienated the minds of the soldiery from him<sup>9</sup>; who began to be very mutinous, being stirred up by Appius Claudius, whom Lucullus had turned out of his command for his vile behaviour, notwithstanding he was nearly related to him, Lucullus having married his sister. The discontent that prevailed in the army came to such a height, that Lucullus was obliged to lie still in his camp all that summer, the soldiers declaring in a mutinous manner, that they would not follow him any longer, nor serve under a general who refused to share the booty with them, taxing thereby Lucullus with covetousness; which charge was not altogether groundless, for he amassed immense riches during that war, and was suspected at Rome of spinning it out, that he might be continued in the government of Asia. These complaints, and the general discontent that reigned in the army, obliged the senate to recall Lucullus, and appoint Manius Acilius Glabrio, consul of that year, in his room. Glabrio arriving in Bithynia, gave notice by public criers to all the cities, that the senate had discharged Lucullus and his army, and confiscated his goods for protracting the war, and refusing to comply with their injunctions. Hereupon Lucullus was abandoned by the greater part of his army and forced to retire into Galatia, not being in a condition to make head against the joint forces of the two kings, who, laying hold of that opportunity, recovered the best part of Pontus, Bithynia, Cappadocia, and Armenia Minor; for tho' Glabrio had hastened into Pontus, as if he intended to engage the enemy, and rob Lucullus of the victory, yet, upon the first news of the approach of the two kings, he thought fit to retire, and leave the country open on all sides to the enemy. When this was heard at Rome, a law was enacted there by C. Manilius, a tribune of the people, whereby the management of their war against Mithridates and Tigranes was committed to Pompey, and likewise the provinces of Cilicia, then under Quintus Marcius, and of Bithynia, under Glabrio. By the same law he was continued in that unlimited power by sea, with which he was invested when he was first sent out against the pirates of Cilicia <sup>(R)</sup>. In virtue of this law, Pompey, who had just then ended the war with the Cilician pirates, took upon him the command of the army, and directed all the allies of the Roman people to join him with all possible expedition; but before he took the field, he renewed the alliance which Sylla and Lucullus had concluded with Phraates king of Parthia, and then sent friendly proposals to Mithridates, who at first seemed inclined to give ear to them, and accordingly dispatched an ambassador to the Roman army to treat of a peace. Pompey required of him to lay down his arms, if he was in earnest, and deliver up to him all those who had revolted from the Romans during the war. This demand was no sooner bruited abroad in the king's camp, but the deserters, who were very numerous in the king's army, betaking themselves to their arms, threatened to put Mithridates himself to death,

(R) Livy observes, that this law passed against the will of the nobility, who thought it a manifest injury to Lucullus, that one should be appointed to succeed him, not so much in the war, as in the triumph, and to take possession of the spoils, rather than to carry on a war; besides, the senate was unwilling to recal Marcius and Glabrio from their governments, before the time, for which they had been given, was expired. But what gave them the greatest uneasiness, was the extensive and uncontrouled power which by this law was vested in Pompey, the command of all the armies out of Italy being conferred upon him. When news was brought to Pompey that this law had passed, he is said to have complained, as if the people of Rome had laid too great a burden on him; whereas every one knew that the law had been proposed by Manilius at his instigation, and that his main aim was to have all the power in his own hands (58).

and would have occasioned a great disturbance, had not the king appeased the growing tumult, by assuring them, that he had sent embassadors, not to treat of a peace, but only to take, under pretence of suing for a peace, a view of the enemy's strength. He moreover obliged himself, by a solemn oath in the presence of the whole army, never to enter into any treaty of friendship with the Romans, nor to deliver up to them such as had ever served under him<sup>c</sup>. Pompey, finding his proposals rejected, advanced against the king with an army of thirty thousand foot and twenty thousand horse, as Plutarch<sup>e</sup> writes, or thirty thousand, as we read in Appian<sup>u</sup>, all chosen troops; for he discharged most of those who had served under Glabrio and Lucullus. As he entered Galatia, he was met by Lucullus, who endeavoured to persuade him to march back, the war being near finished, and even deputies sent by the republic to settle the province of Pontus; but not being able to prevail with him, after mutual complaints against each other, they parted; and Pompey, removing his camp, commanded the troops that were with Lucullus to join him, except one thousand six hundred, whom he left to attend Lucullus in his triumph. From thence Lucullus set out for Rome, where he was received by the senate with great marks of esteem, most men thinking him highly injured by the authors of the Manilian law. Pompey pursued his march into Pontus; but, finding that he could not by any means draw the king to a battle, he marched back into Armenia Minor, with a design either to reduce that province, or oblige Mithridates to venture a battle in order to relieve it. Mithridates followed him at some distance, and entering Armenia, encamped on a hill over-against the Romans, and, by intercepting their convoys, reduced them to such distress, that they were obliged to remove to a more convenient place, the king cutting off many in their rear, and harassing them with frequent attacks, till he fell into an ambuscade laid by Pompey, whose personal courage and prudent conduct on that occasion confirmed the king in his resolution not to hazard a general engagement. The two armies encamped again over-against each other, Pompey on one hill, and the king on another, near the city of Dastira, in the province of Acisilene, at a small distance from the Euphrates, which divides Acisilene from Armenia Minor<sup>w</sup>. Here Pompey, seeing he could neither draw the king to a battle, nor force his camp, which was pitched on a steep and craggy

mountain, began to block him up with a ditch, which he carried round the bottom of the hill where the king was encamped, and, meeting with no opposition, finished his work, and quite cut off the enemy's communication with the country. Pompey was amazed to see the king thus tamely suffer himself to be shut up, and could not help saying, that he was either a fool or a great coward; a fool, if he did not apprehend the danger he was in; a coward, if, being apprised of it, he did not, to the utmost of his power, prevent it. By this ditch, which was one hundred and fifty furlongs in circuit, and defended by many forts raised at small distances from each other, the king was so closely besieged, that he could neither send out parties to forage, nor receive the supplies that came to him from Pontus. He was thus besieged for the space of forty five or fifty days, and his army reduced to such straits, that, having consumed all their provisions, they were at last forced to live on their dead horses. Hereupon Mithridates resolved, at all events, to break through the Roman fortifications; and accordingly, having put to the sword all those that were sick or disabled, that they might not fall into the enemy's hands, he attacked in the dead of the night the Roman guards, and having overpowered them with his numbers, got safe into the open fields, and continued his march all night towards Armenia Major, where he was expected by Tigranes. Pompey, next morning by break of day, pursued the enemy with his whole army, and having with much ado overtaken them, found the king encamped on a hill, to which there was but one ascent, and that guarded by a strong body of foot. The Romans encamped over-against them; but Pompey, fearing the king should make his escape in the night-time, privately decamped, and taking the same rout the enemies were to hold in order to gain Armenia, possessed himself of all the eminences and defiles through which the king was to pass. Mithridates thinking that Pompey was returned to his former camp, pursued his march, and, about the dusk of the evening, entered a narrow valley, which was surrounded on all sides by steep hills. On these hills the Romans lay concealed, expecting the signal to fall upon the enemy, and attack them on all sides at once, while they were tired with their march, and seemingly, as they had sent out no scouts, in great security (S). Pompey was at first for putting off the attack

(S) Plutarch tells us, that Mithridates, retiring to his pavilion to take some repose after his march, was by a dream forewarned of

attack till the next morning, thinking it not safe to engage in the night-time among such steep and craggy mountains; but was at last prevailed upon, by the earnest prayers and intreaties of all the chief officers of his army, to fall upon the enemy that very night. It was therefore agreed that, in the dead of the night, all the trumpets should at once sound the charge, that this signal should be followed by an universal shout of the whole army, and that the soldiers should make what noise they could, by striking their spears against the brass vessels that were used in the camp. The king's army, at this sudden and unexpected noise, which was echoed again by the mountains, imagined at first that the gods themselves were come down from heaven to destroy them; and the Romans charging them on all sides with showers of stones and arrows from the tops of the hills; they betook themselves to a precipitate flight; but finding all the passes beset with strong bodies of horse and foot, were forced to fly back into the valley, where, for many hours together, they were exposed to the enemy's shot, without being able, in that confusion, either to attack them, or defend themselves. They attempted indeed to make some resistance when the moon rose; but the Romans running down upon them from the hills, did not give them time to draw up, and the place was so narrow, that they had not room even to make use of their swords (T). The king lost on that occasion ten thousand men according to Appian, but forty thousand according to Eutropius and others *. On Pompey's side there fell between

of the misfortune that beset him; for he seemed to be sailing with a fair wind in the Pontic sea, and to discover with great joy the Bosphorus, when all on a sudden he found himself shipwrecked, and cast on an abandoned and inhospitable shore. While he was in this perplexity, his generals rushed into the tent, and acquainted him that Pompey was at hand, which gave him great uneasiness, tho' he did not at that time communicate his dream to any of his most intimate friends (59).

(T) Florus, Plutarch, and Eutropius tell us, that as the Romans advanced, the moon shining on their backs, and because she was then in her wane, making their shadows appear mighty long, the enemy thereby judging of their nearness, discharged their darts against their shadows, and gave the Romans an opportunity of attacking them unarmed (60).

twenty and thirty private men and two centurions. Mithridates, at the head of eight hundred horse, broke thro' the Roman army, and being, after this effort, abandoned by all the rest, because they were closely pursued by the enemy, he travelled all night, attended by three persons only, viz. his wife, or, as Plutarch calls her, his concubine, by name Hypsieratia, his daughter Dripetine, and an officer. At day-break he fell in with a body of mercenary horse and three thousand foot, who were marching to join him. By these he was escorted to the castle of Sinoria, situated on the borders of the two Armenias. As great part of his treasures were lodged here, he rewarded very liberally those who accompanied him in his flight, and taking six thousand talents, withdrew into Armenia. As soon as he entered the borders, he dispatched embassadors to Tigranes, acquainting him with his arrival; but that prince, who was then on the point of concluding a separate peace with the Romans, clapt his embassadors in irons, pretending that his son Tigranes had, at the instigation of Mithridates, revolted first to the Parthians and then to the Romans. Mithridates, finding himself thus abandoned, even by his son-in-law, left Armenia, and directing his course towards Colchis, which was subject to him, and had not as yet been invaded by the Romans, passed the Euphrates the fourth day, and got safe into his own territories. Pompey sent out several parties in pursuit of the king; but remained himself with the main body of the army in the field of battle, where he built a city, calling it, from that remarkable victory, Nicopolis. This city, with the adjoining territory, he bestowed upon such of his soldiers as were old or disabled; and many flocking to it from the neighbouring countries, it became, in a short time, a very considerable place†. This battle is by most of the Roman historians said to have been fought in the night-time (U), tho' Appian, and those that have copied after him, tell us, that it happened in the day-time. Be that as it will, it was certainly attended with very fatal consequences for Mithridates, who was forced, his army being entirely either cut off off or dispersed, to abandon his own dominions, and fly for shelter to the most remote parts of Scythia. Pompey, having concluded a peace with Tigranes, as we have related in the history of Armenia, and settled the affairs of that kingdom, began his march in pursuit of Mithridates, through those countries that lie about mount Caucasus. The barbarous nations through which he passed, chiefly the Albanians and Iberians, attempted to stop his march; but were put to flight. However, he was obliged, by the excessive cold and deep roads, to pass the winter near the river Cyrus. Early in the spring he pursued his march; but meeting with great opposition from the Iberians, a warlike nation, and entirely devoted to Mithridates, he was employed most part of the summer in reducing them; as we shall relate more at length in the history of that people. In the mean time Mithridates who had wintered at Dioscurias, on the isthmus between the Euxine and Caspian seas, and had been joined there by such of his troops as had made their escape from the late unfortunate battle, continued his flight through the countries of the Achæans, Zygians, Heniochians, Cercetans, Moschi and Colchians. Of these nations some received him kindly, and even entered into an alliance with him; through others he was forced to make himself a way with his sword<sup>2</sup>. Pompey took the same rout, directing his course by the stars, especially in the northern parts of Scythia, and carrying with him even provision of water to supply the army in the vast deserts through which he marched. He spent two years in warring with these nations, and was often in danger of losing both his life and his army; but at last he overcame them all, and believing Mithridates, of whom he could have no account, to be dead, he marched back into Armenia Minor, where he allowed some rest to his soldiers, who were quite worn out with the hardships they had endured in that expedition <sup>a</sup>. Having refreshed his army, he marched into Pontus, to reduce some strong holds, which were still garisoned by the king's troops. While he was at Aspis in Pontus, many of the king's concubines were brought to him; but he sent them all home to their parents, without offering them the least injury, and thereby gained the affection of the chief lords of Pontus, whose daughters they were. The strong castle of Symphori was delivered up to him by Stratonice one of the king's concubines, upon no other terms than that he would spare her son Xiphares, who was with the king, in case he should fall into his hands. She likewise discovered to him great treasures hid under ground, which he with great generosity bestowed upon her, reserving for himself only some vessels to set off his triumph <sup>b</sup>. Having taken another fort called the New-Castle, and to that time looked upon as impregnable, he found in it great store of gold, silver, and other valuable things, which he afterwards consecrated to Jupiter Capitolinus. Here in looking over the king's manuscripts, he came to discover where the rest of his treasures were concealed, what troops he could raise and maintain, what sums were yearly paid him by his subjects and tributaries, &c. whereby he could make a true estimate of his whole power and wealth <sup>c</sup>. Amongst other manuscripts he found some books of physic wrote by Mithridates himself, which he commanded Lenæus, a learned grammarian to translate into Latin <sup>d</sup>. Pompey, having thus reduced all Pontus, marched into Syria, with a design to recover that kingdom, and passing through Arabia to penetrate as far as the Red-Sea. But while he was employed in this expedition news was brought him, that Mithridates, whom he believed dead, had appeared unexpectedly in Pontus at the head of a considerable army, and surprized Panticapæum, a famous empory at the mouth of the Euxine sea. He had lain all this time concealed in the territories of a Scythian prince adjoining to the Palus Mæotis; but hearing that Pompey had left Pontus, and was engaged in other wars, he ventured out of his hiding place, resolved either to recover his paternal kingdom, or die in the attempt. He returned privately into Pontus, and managed matters there so dexterously, that the Roman garrisons knew nothing of his arrival till he appeared with a considerable army in the field. He advanced first to the castle of Symphori, and understanding that Stratonice had delivered it up to Pompey on condition he would save the life of her son in case he should take him prisoner, the king immediately caused the youth, who was in his army, to be put to death, and his body to be left unburied; Stratonice beholding from the walls the cruel and unnatural murder, for he was her son by Mithridates, and had served him with great fidelity. At the same time he sent ambassadors to Pompey to treat of a peace, offering to pay a yearly tribute to the republic on condition he restored him to his kingdom. Pompey replied, that he would hearken to no proposals whatsoever without the king came to treat with him in person, as Tigranes had done. This Mithridates looked upon as no ways consistent with his dignity, and therefore laying aside all thoughts of an accommodation, began to make what preparations he could for renewing the war. He summoned all his subjects that were able to bear arms to meet at an appointed place, and having chosen out of the whole multitude sixty cohorts, each consisting of a hundred men, incorporated them with the regular troops that were already on foot. Being now in a condition to act offensively, for Pompey had left but a small number of troops in Pontus, he possessed himself of Phanagorium, Chersonesus, Theudosia, Nymphæum, and several other important places. But in the mean time Castor, whom Mithridates had appointed governor of Phanagorium, falling out with Tripha, one of the king's favourite eunuchs, killed him, and dreading the king's resentment, stirred up the inhabitants to a revolt; and by this means Phanagorium was again lost; but the castle which was defended by four of the king's sons, Artaphernes, Darius, Xerxes, and Oxathres, held out for some time. The king hastened to their relief; but the castle, being set on fire by the rebels, they were forced to surrender themselves to Castor before his arrival. These four sons with one of the king's daughters, by name Cleopatra, Castor sent to the Romans, and fortifying himself in the town, persuaded most of the neighbouring cities, which were oppressed with heavy taxes, and strangely harassed by the king's collectors, to join in the rebellion. Mithridates finding that he could neither rely upon the soldiery, most of them being forced into the service, nor on his other subjects, who were dissatisfied by reason of the exorbitant taxes, sent ambassadors to invite the princes of Scythia to his relief; and with them his daughters to be bestowed in marriage upon such as shewed themselves most inclined to assist him. But as the ambassadors he employed on this occasion were eunuchs, a race of men no less abhorred by the army than favoured by the king, over whom they had a great ascendant, especially in his old age, the soldiers, who were sent to attend them on their journey, put them all to the sword as soon as they were out of the king's reach, and delivered his daughters up to the Romans. Mithridates finding himself thus deprived of his children, betrayed by his army, and forsaken even by those on whom he chiefly relied, could not yet be induced to submit to the Romans, though Pompey promised him honourable conditions provided he came to treat with him in person. In this desperate condition he left no stone unturned to stir up the princes of Asia against the Romans, especially the Parthians, but finding them awed by the great opinion they all had of Pompey, he had recourse at last to the European Gauls, whom he understood to be at war with the Romans; and having sent before some of his trusty friends to engage them in his favour, taking leave of his own kingdom, he began his long march, designing to pass through Bosphorus Cimmerius, Scythia, Pannonia, &c. and joining the Gauls, pass the Alps, and invade Italy. This design was no sooner known in the army, The army but the soldiers began openly to complain and mutiny; exag- mutinies gerating the boldness of the attempt, the length of the march, against and the unfurmountable difficulties that must necessarily at- Mithri- tend such a desperate enterprize. The chief commanders did dates. all that lay in their power to divert him from it, representing to him, that if he was not able to cope with the Romans in his own kingdom, much less would he be a match for them in Italy or Gaul, where they could daily receive new supplies, whereas he would lose the best part of his army in so long and difficult a march, and the rest perhaps in the first engagement, without any possibility of repairing the loss. But all was to no purpose, for they found him so unalterably fixed in his resolution, that he caused those to be put to death, who with most warmth remonstrated against it, not sparing even his own son Exipodras for dropping some unguarded expressions on that occasion*. Thus they were forced to let him pursue his own measures, till they found a more proper opportunity to oppose them, which soon after offered as they were encamped at Bosphorus Cimmerius on their march into Scythia. Here Pharnaces, the king's favourite son, whom he had appointed to succeed him, observing the general discontent that reigned in the army, began to entertain thoughts of placing the crown on his own head, and not doubting but the soldiery would stand by him, if he declared against the intended expedition into Italy, openly protested among the Roman deserters, who were a considerable part of the army, that if they would follow him, he would return into Pontus. The Romans, who were well apprised of the danger that attended such an undertaking, and had most of all exclaimed against it, promised to support him to the utmost of their power, and even encouraged him, upon some expressions, which he purposely dropt, to assume the title of king, a title which his father seemed determined to hold till he had destroyed by his rash and desperate attempts himself, his friends, and his army. Pharnaces, finding he could depend on the Romans, engaged the same night most of the chief commanders in his party, and by their means the greater part of the soldiery. It was agreed that next morning by break of day all those who had declared in his favour should appear in arms, and with a loud shout proclaim Pharnaces king; which was done accordingly, and the shout returned even by those, whom Pharnaces had not thought fit to let into the secret. The king, who had taken up his quarters in the city, being awaked by the noise, sent out some of his domestics to know what had happened in the army. Neither did the officers or soldiers dissemble the matter, but boldly answered, that they had chosen a young king instead of an old dotard governed by eunuchs. Hereupon Mithridates mounting on horseback, and attended by his guards, went out to appease the tumult; but his guards forsaking him, and his horse being killed under him, he was obliged to fly back into the city; from whence he sent several of his attendants one after another to desire of his son a safe conduct for himself and his friends. But as none of the messengers returned, some being slain, others siding with the new king, Mithridates endeavoured to move his son to compassion by signifying to him from the walls the distressed condition he was reduced to by a son, whom he had favoured above the rest of his children; but finding him no-ways affected by his speech, turning to the gods, he beseeched them with many tears to make his son know one day by experience the grief and agony which a father must feel in seeing his love and tenderness requited with such ungrateful and monstrous returns. Having thus spoke, he thanked in a very obliging manner those who had stood by him to the last, and exhorted them to make their submission to the new king on the best terms they could procure, cure, adding, that as for himself, he was determined not to outlive the rebellion of a son, whom he had always distinguished with particular marks of paternal affection. After this he withdrew into the apartment of his wives and concubines, where he first took poison himself and then presented it to them, and to his favourite daughters Mithridatis and Nissa, who not long before had been betrothed to the kings of Egypt and Cyprus. To the women it proved immediate death, but on the king, who had from his infancy inured his constitution to poisonous potions, it had so slow an operation, that he was forced, through fear of falling into the rebels hands, to recur to his sword. Neither did the wound, as he was greatly weakened by the poison, prove mortal; so that the rebels having in the mean time stormed the town, and broke into the house, found the king wallowing in his blood, but still alive and in his senses; which Pharnaces hearing, sent some of those that were about him to dress his wound, with a design to deliver him up to the Romans, and thereby ingratiate himself with Pompey. But in the mean time a Gaul, who served in the army, by name Bitætus or Bithocus, entering the king's room in quest of booty, and being touched with compassion in seeing him forsaken by all his friends, and struggling on the bare ground with the pangs of death, drawing his sword, put an end to his present agonies, and prevented the insults which he chiefly apprehended, if he should fall alive into his son's hands. The barbarian is said when he first saw the king, to have been so awed with the majesty of his countenance, that, forgetful of his booty, he fled out of the room, but being called back, and earnestly entreated by the dying prince to put an end to his misery, he summoned all his courage to perform, as he did with a trembling hand, that office, and immediately retired without touching any thing that belonged to the king, tho' the hopes of a rich booty, was the only motive that had led him in thither<sup>f</sup>. Thus died Mithridates at Panticapæum in the Cimmerian Bosphorus (W), in the sixtieth year of his reign, a prince, as Velleius Paterculus

As they were thus disordered, and intangled among the rocks, it was easy for Pompey to perform the rest. He put ten thousand to the sword, made a great many prisoners, and took their camp with all their baggage and provisions. Thus Appian.

He adds this observation, that Mithridates, in other respects a wise prince, did not consider that arms and multitudes of subjects do not avail without their good-will ; but on the contrary, the more numerous they are, the more they are to be dreaded, if they are disaffected to the prince or his government. As to the time which the Mithridatic war lasted, Orosius writes thus (64) : “ The Mithridatic war, which involved many provinces, was protracted for the space of forty years. For it broke out in the year 662 of Rome, a year remarkable for the first civil war, and in the consulship of Cicero and Antonius ; to use the expression of that excellent poet Lucan, Barbarico vix consummata veneno, it was ended not by dint of sword but by poison.” But this space consists of thirty years only, and how most authors came to write forty, is not easy to find out. Justin (65), Florus (66), and Extropius (67), will have the Mithridatic war to have lasted forty years ; Appian (68) writes, that Mithridates warred with the Romans forty two years ; the inscription which Pompey placed under the spoils consecrated to Minerva in the temple at Rome, informs us, as it is related by Pliny (69), that the Mithridatic war lasted only thirty years. But neither is it an easy matter to make out even the space of thirty years, for from the first breaking out of that war to the death of Mithridates, we can reckon but twenty six years, even taking the years of peace between the first and second war into the account ; so that the war may be said to have lasted thirty years only to make up an even number ; thus Tully in an oration, which he made during his consulship (70), says, that he had defended C. Rabirius, forty years before that honour was conferred upon him ; but Dio by a more exact computation shews this to have happened only thirty six years before that time (71).

perienced commander, but more to be admired for the greatness of mind with which he bore misfortunes, than for the many victories he gained. Tully calls him the greatest king after Alexander that ever swayed a sceptre <sup>h</sup>. He subdued twenty four nations, and could talk their various languages with the same ease and fluency as his own. He is said to have applied himself to the study of the Greek tongue, and even to have wrote in that dialect a learned treatise of botanics <sup>i</sup>. Pliny tells us <sup>k</sup>, that he had extraordinary skill in physic, and was the inventor, not only of Mithridate, but of many other useful medicines. But nothing gives us a greater idea of this prince than the joy which the Romans shewed, notwithstanding their many victories, and the low ebb he was reduced to, when they first heard the news of his death. Pompey, who was at that time engaged in a war with the Jews, received the first notice of the death of Mithridates, as he was on his march to Jerusalem. The messenger, who brought the joyful tidings, was sent by Pharnaces, and appeared unexpectedly before Pompey with the branch of a laurel, as was customary on the like occasions, twisted round the head of his javelin. When he heard what had happened at Panticapæum, he was The joy of so impatient to impart it to the soldiery, that he could not the Ro- even wait till they raised him a mount with turf to speak mans at from thence to the army, according to the custom of the his death. camp; but ordered those who were by him to form a kind of mount with their saddles, and from thence acquainted the soldiery, that Mithridates had laid violent hands on himself, and his son Pharnaces was ready to acknowledge the kingdom as a gift of the people of Rome, or resign it, if they were unwilling he should reign. This news was received with joyful shouts of the whole army, and the day solemnized with feasts and sacrifices throughout the camp, as if in Mithridates alone all the enemies of the republic had died <sup>l</sup>. Pompey dispatched without delay a messenger with letters to the senate, acquainting them with the death of Mithridates and the submission of his son Pharnaces. When his letters were read, the senators were so overjoyed, that they appointed, at the proposal of Cicero then consul, twelve days for returning due thanks to the gods, who had delivered them from such an insulting and powerful enemy <sup>m</sup>; and the tribunes of the people enacted a law, whereby Pompey, in consideration of his eminent service in the Mithridatic war, was to wear a crown of laurel with the triumphal gown at the Circensian sports, and a purple gown at the scenical plays <sup>n</sup>.

BUT to return to Pharnaces, when he heard of his father's death, he caused his body to be preserved in brine, proposing to present it to Pompey, who had promised to return into Pontus after the reduction of Judæa, and there settle matters to his satisfaction. And accordingly, having taken the city and temple of Jerusalem, he set out with two legions for Pontus, and being arrived at Sinope, he was met there by embassadors from Pharnaces, acquainting him, that their master had forbore assuming the title of king, till his will and pleasure were known; that he put both himself and the kingdom intirely into his hands, and that he was willing to attend him at what time or place he thought fit to appoint. The same embassadors delivered up to Pompey those who had taken Manius Aquilius the Roman legate, whom Mithridates had put to a cruel death, all the prisoners, hostages, and deserters, whether Romans, Greeks, or Barbarians, and the body of Mithridates, with his rich apparel and arms, which were greatly admired by Pompey and the other Romans. Both soldiers and officers flocked to see the king's body, but Pompey declined that sight; and saying that all enmity between that great prince and the people of Rome was ended with his life, he returned the body to the embassadors, and caused it to be interred with the utmost pomp and magnificence among his ancestors in the burying-place of the kings of Pontus, Pompey defraying all the charges of that ceremony, which was the most costly and pompous that ever had been seen in those parts. With the body Pompey restored his wearing apparel and armour; but the scabbard of his sword, which cost four hundred talents, was stolen by Rublius a Roman, and sold to Ariarathes king of Cappadocia; and his cap or turbant, which was a very curious piece of workmanship, was privately taken by one Caius, who presented it to Faustus the son of Sylla, in whose house it was kept, and shewn for many years after among the many rarities which Sylla had brought out of Asia. Pompey bestowed the kingdom of Bosphorus on Pharnaces, and honoured him with the title of a friend and ally of the people of Rome <sup>o</sup>. Pharnaces, being thus acknowledged king of Bosphorus, sent orders to all the garisons on Pharnaces.

of Pontus to submit themselves with the castles and treasures which they were trusted with to Pompey, who by that means amassed an immense booty. In the city of Talaura, which Mithridates used to call his wardrobe, he found two thousand cups of onyx set in gold, with such store of gold and silver vessels, of costly furniture, of saddles, bridles, and trappings set with jewels and precious stones, that the Roman commissaries spent thirty days in taking the inventory of the whole<sup>p</sup>. In another castle he found three large tables with nine salvers of massy gold, enriched with precious stones to an inestimable value, the statues of Minerva, Mars, and Apollo, of pure gold and most curious workmanship, and a pair of gaming tables of two precious stones, three foot broad and four foot long, on which was a moon of gold weighing thirty pounds, with their men all of the same precious stone. In a fort situated among the mountains, were delivered up to him the king's statue of massy gold eight cubits high, his throne and sceptre, and the bed of Darius the son of Hystaspes. Most of these treasures had been transmitted to him from his ancestors, chiefly from Darius king of Persia; some belonged to the Ptolemies of Egypt, and had been deposited by Cleopatra, as we have hinted above, in the hands of the Coans, who delivered them to Mithridates; great part of them had been collected by the king himself, who was very fond of rich and stately furniture<sup>q</sup>. Pompey, having thus got entire possession of Pontus, and reduced it to the form of a Roman province, marched into Asia properly so called, and, having wintered at Ephesus, early in the spring set out for Italy with a fleet of seven hundred ships. As he brought over his army with him, the senate was under no small apprehension, lest he should make himself absolute and rule without controul. But he no sooner landed at Brundisium than he disbanded the army, without waiting for any decree either of the senate or people; what neither his friends nor his enemies had believed<sup>r</sup>. His triumph lasted two whole days, and though he was attended in his triumphal chariot by three hundred and twenty four captives of distinction, among whom were five sons and two daughters of Mithridates, yet he would not suffer any of them to be put to death, as it had been practised by others, but sent them all back, except such as were of royal extraction, to their respective countries, and even supplied them with money, to defray the charges of their journey<sup>c</sup>. After his triumph he delivered into the treasury twenty thousand talents, though at the dismissing of the army he had divided sixteen thousand talents among the tribunes and centurions, two thousand sestertiums among the quæstors, and had given to each foldier fifty sestertiums.

Pompey had no sooner left Asia, but Pharnaces fell unexpectedly upon the Phanagorenses, a people of Bosphorus, whom Pompey had declared free, because they had revolted the first of all from Mithridates, and by their example induced others to abandon the king's party. Pharnaces besieged their chief city Phanagoria, and kept them blocked up, till for want of provisions they were forced to sally out, and put all to the issue of a battle; which proving unsuccessful, they delivered up themselves and their city to the conqueror<sup>t</sup>. Some years after, the civil war breaking out between Cæsar and Pompey, he laid hold of that opportunity to recover the provinces which his father had formerly possessed; and having raised a considerable army, over-ran Pontus, Colchis, Bithynia, Armenia, and the kingdom of Moschis, where he plundered, as Strabo observes<sup>u</sup>, the temple of the goddess Leucothea. He also took the strong and important city of Sinope, but could not reduce Amisus. But in the mean time Cæsar, having got the better of Pompey and his party, appointed Cn. Domitius Calvinus governor of Asia, injoining him to make war upon Pharnaces with the legions that were quartered in that province<sup>w</sup>. Domitius immediately dispatched embassadors to Pharnaces, commanding him to withdraw his troops from Armenia and Cappadocia. The king returned answer, that he was willing to abandon Cappadocia; but as for the kingdom of Armenia Minor, it was part of his hereditary dominions, and therefore he would not resign it, till he had an opportunity of laying his pretensions before Cæsar himself, whom he was ready to obey in all things. Hereupon Domitius, drawing together what forces he could, marched into Cappadocia, which he recovered without opposition, Pharnaces having abandoned it to make a stand in Armenia, which lay nearer his own dominions. Thither Domitius pursued him, and having overtaken him near Nicopolis, found his army drawn up in battle-array, and the king ready to come to an engagement, which Domitius not declining, both armies advanced. The king at the head of a choice body of men fell upon the Romans left wing, consisting mostly of raw and undisciplined Asiatics; and having without much ado put them to flight, penetrated to the centre, where the thirty fifth legion, the only one which Domitius had, after a faint resistance gave ground, and retiring to the neighbouring mountains, left their allies to shift for themselves, who were all cut off. Domitius with the remains of his scattered army marched back into Cappadocia, and from thence, winter drawing on, into the province of Asia *. The king being puffed up with this victory, and hearing that Cæsar, with the flower of the Roman forces, was engaged at the siege of Alexandria, appointed one Asander governor of Bosphorus, and marched himself into Cappadocia in pursuit of Domitius, with a design to invade Asia, and recover all the provinces which had been once subdued by his father. Bitthynia and Cappadocia readily submitted; but Armenia the Lesser, which was held by Dejotarus, made so vigorous a resistance, that he was forced to give over the enterprize, lest the Romans should in the mean time strengthen themselves in Asia, whither he was in haste to march, in hopes of meeting there with the same success as his father Mithridates had done. But before he reached that province, he was informed that Asander had revolted, in hopes of gaining thereby the good will of the Romans, and obtaining of them the kingdom of Bosphorus for himself. At the same time he received intelligence, that Cæsar, having at last reduced Alexandria, and settled the affairs of Egypt and Syria, was marching into Armenia. He was not a little dismayed at this news, and therefore without delay dispatched ambassadors to sue for peace, hoping that Cæsar, who was hastening into Italy, with a design to pass over into Afric, would willingly give ear to any proposals of that nature. Cæsar courteously entertained the ambassadors, and tho' he did not propose to agree to their conditions, yet, that he might come upon Pharnaces unawares, he shewed himself very desirous of entering into a treaty of peace. But in the mean time he pursued his march with all possible expedition, and arriving on the confines of Pontus, ordered all the troops that were quartered in the neighbouring provinces to join him; for he had brought from Alexandria but one legion, namely the sixth, and that consisting of a thousand men only, the rest having been killed at the siege of Alexandria. Besides this veteran legion, he found at the place of the general rendezvous three others, but all of them very indifferently armed, and worse disciplined <sup>y</sup>. With these forces, however, such as they were, he advanced against Pharnaces, who being greatly frightened at his approach, by reason of the success that had attended him in all his expeditions, again dispatched ambassadors to him with a crown of gold, offering him his daughter in marriage, and promising to do whatever he should require. The ambassadors took care to let Cæsar know, that their master, tho' highly obliged to Pompey, yet had never been prevailed upon to send him any supplies during the civil war, which Dejotarus, king of Armenia the Lesser, whom he had honoured with his friendship, had done. Cæsar returned answer, that he was willing to conclude a peace with Pharnaces, provided he retired without delay from Pontus, returned all the captives and hostages, whether Romans or their allies, and restored the goods of the Roman citizens and publicans which he had seized since he first took up arms. He added, that as to his not sending supplies to Pompey, they ought rather to have concealed such an ungrateful proceeding of their master, than alledged it as any merit, since the forsaking of one, to whom he was indebted for his crown, bespoke him a man of mean, selfish, and wicked principles<sup>z</sup>. Pharnaces, upon the return of his ambassadors, acquainted Cæsar, that he agreed to the conditions; but finding that Cæsar's affairs called him into Italy, he required a longer term of time for the performance of what was stipulated between them, starting daily new difficulties, in hopes that Cæsar would in the mean time be obliged to depart, and leave the affairs of Pontus in the same posture he had found them. Cæsar seeing himself thus disappointed, and put off from day to day, could not longer brook the king's deceitful behaviour. Wherefore he determined to put himself at the head of his small army, and attack the enemy in his camp, when he least expected it. And accordingly marching out in the night, he came by break of day in sight of the king's army, and uttering these words, Shall this treacherous parricide go unpunished? broke into the camp at the head of a thousand horse. The king's chariots, which were armed with scythes, caused some small disorder among Cæsar's horse; but in the mean time the rest of his army coming up, he put the enemies to flight, and obtained a complete victory<sup>a</sup>. This battle was fought near the place where Mithridates had routed with great slaughter the Roman army under the command of Triarius. Most of the king's army were either taken or cut in pieces; but Pharnaces himself had the good luck to make his escape, while the Romans were busy in plundering the camp. This victory was so quick, that Cæsar, in a letter to his friend Aminitius, or Anitius, at Rome, expressed it in three words; thus: I came, I saw, I conquered. He ever afterwards used to call Pompey a fortunate rather than a great commander, since he had gained his chief glory in the Mithridatic war, fighting with so cowardly an enemy <sup>b</sup>. He divided the rich booty and the spoils of the camp among his soldiers, and because Mithridates had erected a trophy near that place, as a monument of his victory over Triarius, which Cæsar, as it was consecrated to the gods, did not think lawful to pull down, he set up another over-against it to transmit to posterity his victory over Pharnaces. After this victory he recovered and restored to the allies of the people of Rome all the places which Pharnaces had possessed himself of during the war, declared Amisus a free city, and appointed Mithridates Pergamenus, of whom more hereafter, king of Bosphorus in the room of Pharnaces. Having thus settled the affairs of Pontus, he set sail for Italy, leaving Domitius Calvinus to pursue the war against Pharnaces, if he should appear again in the field. Pharnaces had retired after the battle to Sinope with a thousand horse, where he was quickly besieged by Domitius, to whom he surrendered the town upon no other conditions than that he should be suffered to retire into Bosphorus with the small body that attended him. This Domitius willingly granted, but caused all the king's horses to be killed, since he had asked a safe conduct only for his horsemen <sup>c</sup>. With these, and a band of Scythians and Sarmatians, he attempted to recover the kingdom of Bosphorus; but being met between Theudesia and Panticapæum, both which cities he had reduced, by Asander, who was still in possession of the kingdom, a sharp engagement ensued, wherein the king's men, as not being used to fight on foot, were put to flight, and Pharnaces himself, who remained alone in the field, surrounded by the enemy, and cut in pieces, after having reigned in Bosphorus Cimmerius, the kingdom which Pompey had bestowed upon him, according to Appian <sup>d</sup>, fifteen years, according to others, seventeen.

UPON the death of Pharnaces the kingdom of Pontus was again reduced to the form of a province, and so continued to the triumvirate of Marc Antony, who after the battle at Philippi conferred it upon Darius, the son of Pharnaces, for his services during the civil war<sup>c</sup>. He continued faithful to the Romans, but did nothing during his reign worth mentioning.

Darius was succeeded in the kingdom by Polemon, preferred to that honour by Marc Antony. He was the son of Zeno, a famous orator of Laodicea, and greatly favoured by Antony. From him that part of Pontus, which borders on Cappadocia, borrowed the name of Pontus Polemoniacus. He attended Marc Antony in his expedition against the Parthians, and being taken prisoner in the unsuccessful battle fought by Statianus, he was sent by the king of the Medes, an ally of the Parthians, to conclude a peace with the Romans. In which embassy he acquitted himself so well, that Antony added the kingdom of Armenia to his other dominions. In the war between Antony and Augustus he sided with the former; but after the battle at Actium was received into favour by the latter; and being sent by Agrippa against Scribonius, who upon the death of Asander had usurped the kingdom of Bosphorus, he overcame him, and reduced the kingdom of Colchis, which was bestowed upon him by Agrippa, who likewise honoured him with the title of friend and ally of the people of Rome. He afterwards waged war with the neighbouring Barbarians, refusing to live in subjection to the Romans, but was overcome, taken, and put to death by the Aspungitani, a people bordering, according to Strabo, on the Palus Mæotis<sup>f</sup>.

UPON his death his son Polemon II. was by the emperor Caligula raised to the throne of Bosphorus and Pontus. But the emperor obliged him to exchange the kingdom of Bosphorus with part of Cilicia, and Nero with his consent reduced that part of Pontus, which he enjoyed, to the form of a province. He fell in love with Berenice daughter to Agrippa king of Judæa, and, in order to marry her, embraced the Jewish religion. But as she became soon tired of his riotous way of living, and returned to her father, so he renounced his new religion, and again embraced the superstitions of paganism<sup>g</sup>. Polemon dying without issue, the ancient kingdom of Pontus was parcelled out into several parts, and added to the provinces of Bithynia, Galatia, and Cappadocia, only that part of it, which was called Pontus Polemoniacus, retaining the dignity of a distinct and separate province. During the civil discords between Vespasian and Vitellius, one Anicetus, first a slave, afterwards freedman, to king Polemon, and lastly commander of the royal navy, took up arms with a design to rescue the kingdom from the Roman bondage; and being joined by great multitudes, drawn together with the prospect of spoil, over-ran the country, and possessed himself of Trapezund, a city founded by the Grecians on the utmost confines of Pontus. Here he cut in pieces a cohort made up of the inhabitants, but which had been formerly presented with the privilege of Roman citizens. He likewise burnt the fleet, and with scorn and insults scoured the sea, Mucianus having called to Byzantium most of the Roman gallies. Hereupon Vespasian, who was at that time in Syria, sent Verdius Geminus into Pontus with a choice body of vexillaries from the legions. He assailing the enemy, while they were in disorder, and roaming asunder in pursuit of prey, drove them into their vessels; then with some gallies chased Anicetus into the mouth of the river Chobus, where he thought himself safe under the protection of Sedochus king of the Lazians, whose alliance he had purchased with large sums and rich presents. Sedochus at first refused to deliver him up to the Romans, but was soon prevailed upon, partly by threats, partly by presents, to surrender both him and all the other fugitives who had taken sanctuary in his dominions<sup>a</sup>. Thus ended that servile war, and the kingdom of Pontus continued to be a province of the empire till the time of David and Alexis Comneni, who, being driven from Constantinople by the French and Venetians under the command of Baldwin earl of Flanders, settled, the one at Heraclea, the other at Trebisond. The new troubles that arose among the Latins gave Alexis Comnenes, an opportunity of erecting here a new empire, which comprehended great part of Pontus, and was known by the name of the empire of Trebisond. The Comneni held it above two hundred and fifty years, till the time of Mohamed II, who carried David Comnenes, the last emperor of Trebisond, prisoner to Constantinople, with all his family, and subjected his empire to that of Constantinople, in which abject slavery Trebisond and all Pontus have continued ever since.

The description of CAPPADOCIA.

Name and
division.

THIS country was known to the antients by the name of Syria or Assyria, and the inhabitants by that of Leucosyri. It borrowed the name of Cappadocia, according to Pliny<sup>h</sup>, from the river Cappadox; according to Herodianus<sup>i</sup>, from one Cappadocus the founder of this nation and kingdom. Others suppose the name of Cappadocia derived from some barbarous word, whereof the meaning is unknown to us; for the river Cappadox is mentioned only by Pliny, and Cappadocus, the pretended founder of the nation is spoke of by none of the antient historians. Cappadocia in antient times comprised all that country which lies between mount Taurus and the Euxine sea, and was divided by the Persians into two satrapies or governments, by the Macedonians into two kingdoms, the one called Cappadocia ad Taurum and Cappadocia Magna, the other Cappadocia ad Pontum, and commonly Pontus. Of the latter we have given the history already; of the former we are to write in this chapter. Cappadocia Magna, or Cappadocia properly so called, lies between the thirty eighth and forty first degrees of north latitude, and was bounded by Pontus on the north, by Lycaonia and part of Armenia Minor on the south, by Galatia on the west, and by the Euphrates and part of Armenia Minor on the east. Under king Archelaus and some of his predecessors, Cappadocia was divided, as Strabo informs us, into ten prefectures, five of which lay near mount Taurus, viz. Melitena, Cataonia, Cilicia, Tyanitis, Iffauritis; the other five comprehended the remaining part of the kingdom; but Strabo leaves us in the dark as to their situation, and the towns of note which they contained. The metropolis of all Cappadocia in antient Cities. times was Mazaca or Eusebia, called afterwards Cæsarea by Tiberius in honour of Augustus. This latter name it still retains, being called by the inhabitants Kæsaria. It is built round a rock, as Tavernier informs us, on the top of which stands a castle, and is still a populous and considerable city. It was the see of the renowned St. Basil, and its archbishop to this day holds the first rank among the prelates who are under the patriarch of Constantinople. The other cities of note in Cappadocia are, Comana, called Comana Cappadocia, to distinguish it from another city of the same name in Pontus. This city was famous in antient times for a temple consecrated to Bellona, whose priests and attendants of both sexes amounted in Strabo's time to the number of six thousand and upwards. The chief-priest was lord of the adjoining country, and in honour next to the king, being commonly of the royal family. Nyssa in Christian times the see of Gregory, surnamed Nyssenus, and brother to St. Basil. Nazianzum the see and place of nativity of another Gregory, no less celebrated by the writers of the ecclesiastical history. Archelais, so called from Archelaus, king of Cappadocia, who either founded, or repaired and embellished it. Diocæsarea placed by Pliny in Cappadocia, by others in Phrygia, and antiently called, as we read in Strabo, Cabira. Faustinopolis, so called in honour of Faustina, wife to the emperor Antoninus. Cabistra, mentioned by Tully in his letters*. Pterium, memorable for the overthrow of Cræsus by Cyrus, which was attended with the ruin of the Lydian kingdom. The rivers of this country Rivers. that deserve any notice, are, the Melas, which indeed rises in the western borders of Galatia, but passes through the southern borders of this kingdom and Armenia, and falls into the Euphrates; the Halys, which rises near Nazianzum, and bending first to the west, and then to the north, passes through Galatia and Paphlagonia, and discharges itself into the Euxine sea between Sinope and Amisus; the Iris, now Casalmac, which, as Strabo informs us, passed through Amasia his own country, and receiving the Themiscyra falls into the Euxine sea not far from Amisus.

THIS country produces excellent wines and most kind of Soil and fruits; and was formerly rich in mines of silver, brass, iron, climate. and allom; affording also great store of alabaster, crystal, jasper, and onyx-stone. But it was chiefly celebrated by the antients for its breed of horses, which were and still are in great request. Some parts of Cappadocia are very mountainous and barren, the Antitaurus running through those provinces which border on the two Armenias. In this part of Cappadocia stands mount Argaus, of such an extraordinary height, that one may see, as some authors relate, from the top of it the Euxine sea on one side, and the Mediterranean on the other.

Origin.

Cappadocia was probably peopled by Togarmah, the last son of Gomer and his descendants; for it lies contiguous to those countries, which the rest of Gomer's family possessed, and is situated conformable to that expression of the prophet<sup>1</sup>, Gomer and all his bands, the house of Togarmah of the north quarters, and all his bands; which seems to be spoken of their situation with respect to Judæa. Turcomannia, where many have placed this colony seems too remote, because they are said to have traded to the fairs of Tyre<sup>m</sup>; and what confirms their having settled in Cappadocia is, that they brought horses, horsemen, and mules; for that country produced excellent horses and mules, which last are supposed to have come first from thence. Besides in the borders of Pontus and Cappadocia, we find a people called Trocmi, Trogmi, or Trocmeni, as Stephanus calls them. In the council of Chalcedon they are called Trocmades or Trogmades, which names have an affinity with Togarmah, or, as the Greeks usually write it, Thorgama. Bochart<sup>n</sup> observes, that the Cappadocians are said by the fathers to be descended from Caphthorim, the last of the offspring of Mizraim, and that Caphthor is rendered by the septuagint Cappadocia. In this without all doubt they followed the Jews, who explain those names the same way, as do the three Chaldee paraphrasts. But by Cappadocia in these writings is not to be understood Cappadocia in Asia Minor, as Bochart judged; but some place in Egypt, generally supposed by the rabbies to be Demyat or Demietta<sup>o</sup>, commonly confounded with Pelusium.

Government.

As to the state of this nation in the early times we are quite in the dark. Ctesias, as quoted by Diodorus Siculus, tells us, that from the very beginning it was subject to foreign princes. But that writer is no ways to be depended upon. Cappadocia was without all doubt a province of the kingdom of Lydia, and after the overthrow of Cræsus passed from the Lydians to the Persians, to whom the Cappadocians paid an annual tribute, as Strabo writes<sup>p</sup>, of fifteen hundred horses, two thousand mules, and fifty thousand sheep. The first king of Cappadocia we find mentioned in history is Pharnaces, a noble Persian, who having saved Cyrus from a ravenous lion, running full speed against him while he was hunting, was by him rewarded with his sister Atossa and the kingdom of Cappadocia. Diodorus styles him only governor of Cappadocia. This country was afterwards subdued by the Macedonians, and changed into a province; but again restored to its former state by Ariarathes III. who laying hold of the opportunity which the dissensions that reigned among the successors of Alexander gave him, put Amyntas their governor to death, and, with forces raised in Armenia, reinstated himself in the kingdom, which he transmitted to his posterity, who held it till the reign of Ariarathes VIII. the last of the royal race of Pharnaces. Two other families reigned in Cappadocia, namely those of Ariobarzanes and Archelaus; but under the latter the kingdom was changed into a province of the Roman empire, nor ever more returned to its former state. It was greatly enlarged under the emperors, by the addition of Pontus and part of Paphlagonia; and thus it stood in the time of Ptolemy, who reckons Pontus Galaticus, Cappadocius, and Polemoniæcus, as parts of this province. It was afterwards divided into ten prefectures; but in the time of Constantine the great, Pontus, Lycaonia, and Pisidia being made distinct provinces, Cappadocia was confined to its former bounds. The emperor Valens divided Cappadocia into two provinces, Cappadocia Prima and Cappadocia Secunda, making Tyana the metropolis of the latter. We are told that Valens, who was a great abetter of the Arian faction, did this out of spite to St. Basil, who being bishop of Cæsarea, the metropolis of all Cappadocia, prevented the spreading of that heresy in places under his jurisdiction. In this state Cappadocia continued till the erecting of the new empire of Trebisond, with which it fell into the hands of the Turks, by whom the whole province with the addition of Pontus is now called Amasia, after the name of that city where the beglerbeg of Anatolia resides.

THE religion of the antient Cappadocians was much the same with that of the Persians, of which we have given elsewhere an accurate account. At Cumana there was a stately and rich temple consecrated to Bellona, whose battles the priests and their attendants used to represent on stated days, cutting and wounding each other, as if seized with an enthusiastic fury. No less famous and magnificent were the temples of Apollo Catanius or Cataonius at Daflacum, and of Jupiter in the province of Morimena, which last had three thousand thousand sacred servants or religious votaries. The chief-priest was next in rank to that of Comana, and had, as Strabo informs us<sup>9</sup>, a yearly revenue of fifteen talents. Diana Persica was worshipped in the city of Castaballa, where women devoted to the worship of that goddess were reported to tread bare-foot on burning coals without receiving any harm<sup>r</sup>. The temples of Diana at Diospolis and of Anias at Zela were likewise had in great veneration both by the Cappadocians and Armenians, who flocked to them from all parts. In the latter were tendered all oaths in matters of consequence; and the chief among the priests was no ways inferior in dignity, power, or wealth, to any in the kingdom, having a royal attendance, and an uncontrouled power over all the inferior officers and servants of the temple. The Romans, who willingly adopted all the superstitions and superstitious rites of the nations they conquered, greatly-increased the revenues of this and other temples, conferring the priesthood on such as they thought most fit for carrying on their designs. We are told that human sacrifices were offered at Cumana, and that this barbarous practice was brought by Orestes and his sister Iphigenia from Taurica Scythica, where men and women were immolated to Diana. But this custom, if it ever obtained in Cappadocia, was abolished in the Roman times.

Character. THE Cappadocians in the time of the Romans bore so bad a character, were reputed so vicious and lewd, so monstrously addicted to all manner of vice, that besides the share they had in the old Greek proverb, they had some peculiar to themselves reflecting on their enormous wickedness; which made them be so traduced by other nations, that a wicked and impious man was emphatically called a Cappadocian. However, this their lewd disposition was in after-ages so corrected and restrained by the pure morals of christianity, that no country whatsoever has produced greater champions of the Christian religion, or given to the church more prelates of unblemished characters.

Laws and trade. We have no system of their laws, and scarce wherewithal to form any particular idea of them. As to their commerce, they carried on a very considerable trade in horses, great numbers whereof their country produced; and we read of them in scripture as frequenting the fairs of Tyre with this commodity. As Cappadocia abounded with mines of silver, brass, iron, and allom, and afforded great store of alabaster, crystal, and jasper, it is reasonable to suppose that they sup-

S E C T. II.

THE first king of Cappadocia we read of in history was Pharnaces, who was preferred by Cyrus to the crown, and honoured with the marriage of his sister Atossa, as we have hinted above. And this is all we read of him in antient writers. Xenophon calls him Aribæus, and says that he was killed in warring against the Hyrcanians.

Pharnaces was succeeded by his son Smerdis, mentioned only by Diodorus; and he by his son Atamnas, or Ariaramnes, as Ctesias calls him. He cultivated a good understanding with the Persians, and served in the army of Darius the son of Hystaspes, by whom he was employed against the Scythians. In which expedition he took Marsagètes their king's brother, and presented him bound to Darius.

His son Anaphas is celebrated by the antients for his skill in military affairs. He renewed the alliance, which his father had made with the Persians, and was chosen for one of the seven princes of Persia, probably in the room of Intaphernes, who was put to death by Darius for plotting a change in the government.

Anaphas II. succeeded his father; but did nothing worth mentioning. His son Datames succeeded him, the first of his family that waged war with the Persians, we know not on what provocation. In that war having ventured a general engagement, his army was cut in pieces, and himself slain.

His son Ariaramnes reigned fifty years. In his time the Persians invaded Cappadocia, and having reduced great part of it, appointed Datames, brother to Ariaramnes, governor thereof, by way of reward for his services against the Cadusii, whom he had subdued.

Ariarathes ascended the throne on his father's death, and admitted his brother Olophernes to partake of the same power. He accompanied Artaxerxes Ochus in his expedition against the Egyptians, and on that occasion signalized himself above all the other commanders of the Persian army. He

Was

Olophernes. was succeeded by his brother Olophernes, who reigned alone<sup>b</sup> but in the succession to the crown preferred Ariarathes his brother's son to his own children.

Ariarathes II. Ariarathes II. reigned in the time of Alexander the Great, and continued faithful to the Persians at a time when most of the other princes submitted to the conqueror. Alexander was prevented by death from invading his dominions; but Perdiccas, marching against him with a powerful and well-disciplined army, dispersed his forces, and having taken Ariarathes himself prisoner, crucified him with all those of the royal blood whom he could get into his power<sup>c</sup>. Diodorus<sup>d</sup> tells us, that he was killed in the battle. He is said to have reigned eighty two years.

Ariarathes III. His son Ariarathes III. having escaped the general slaughter of the royal family, fled into Armenia, where he lay concealed till the civil dissensions, which arose among the Macedonians, gave him a fair opportunity of recovering his paternal kingdom, which he transmitted to his posterity. Amyntas, who was at that time governor of Cappadocia, opposed him, but was overcome in a pitched battle, and the Macedonians obliged to abandon the strong-holds which they possessed. Ariarathes after a peaceable reign of many years left the kingdom to his son,

Ariaramnes II. Ariaramnes II. who did nothing worth mentioning, but was greatly respected by all the neighbouring princes on account of his good nature, justice, and other princely virtues. During his reign the kingdom was in a more flourishing condition than it had been under any of his predecessors, he having maintained a good understanding with the adjoining states, and applied himself more to the arts of peace than war. He was succeeded by his son,

Ariarathes IV. Ariarathes IV. whom he had taken for partner of the kingdom during his life-time. Ariarathes proved a very warlike prince, and having overcome Arsaces, founder of the Parthian monarchy, considerably enlarged his own dominions.

Ariarathes V. He was succeeded by his son Ariarathes V. who marrying the daughter of Antiochus the Great, entered into an alliance with that prince against the Romans; but Antiochus being conquered, he sent ambassadors to sue for peace, which he obtained after having paid two hundred talents by way of fine, for taking up arms against the people of Rome without any just provocation. He afterwards concluded an alliance with the Romans, and assisted them with men and money against Perfes; on which consideration he was by the senate honoured with the title of friend and ally of the people of Rome. In some disputes that arose between him and Pharnaces II. king of Pontus, concerning the confines of Cappadocia and Galatia, he referred the whole matter to the Roman legates, who favoured him as far as the justice of his cause would allow. He left the kingdom in a very flourishing condition to his son Mithridates, who upon his accession to the crown took the name of Ariarathes.

Ariarathes VI. surnamed Philopator from the filial respect and love he shewed his father from his very infancy, after having performed with the utmost pomp and magnificence his exequies, dispatched ambassadors to Rome to acquaint the senate with his accession to the crown, and to renew the alliance which his father had made with the people of Rome. The ambassadors were kindly received, the alliance renewed, and the king highly commended by the senate for the respect he had shewn them. He restored Mithrobuzanes, son to Zadriades, king of the Lesser Armenia, to his father's kingdom, merely out of good-nature, though he foresaw that the Armenians would lay hold of that opportunity to join Artaxias, who threatened him with war, and was ready to invade Cappadocia. But all these differences were settled, before they came to an open rupture, by the Roman legates, Tiberius Gracchus, Lucius Lentulus, and Servilius Glaucius. Ariarathes seeing himself thus delivered from an impending war by the mediation of the Romans, sent ambassadors to present the senate with a golden crown, and tender his service where-ever they thought fit to employ him. The senate accepted of the crown, and requited the present with a staff and chair of ivory, which they only bestowed on such as were looked upon as intirely addicted to their interest. Not long before Demetrius Soter, king of Syria, had proffered him in marriage his sister, the widow of Perfes king of Macedonia; but Ariarathes had rejected the offer for fear of giving offence to the Romans. For this in particular the senate returned him thanks, and enjoined the ambassadors to acquaint their master, that the senate and people of Rome were fully convinced of his attachment to them, and ready to shew on all occasions how much they had at heart the interest of their true friends and allies<sup>u</sup>, among whom they accounted Ariarathes the chief and most to be depended on. Not long after the king found by experience that their protestations were sincere; for Orophernes, or, as others call him, Holophernes, pretending to be the lawful son of Ariarathes V. and the elder brother, had recourse to Demetrius Soter, who was greatly incensed against Ariarathes for slighting the match which he had proposed with his sister. Demetrius was easily prevailed upon to espouse his cause, though he well knew that Orophernes was but a supposititious, or, as some write, a natural, son of the deceased king. Eumenes king of Pergamus was ordered by the Romans to join Ariarathes with all his forces, and assist him against Demetrius to the utmost of his power, which he did accordingly. But to no effect; for the armies of the confederate kings were worsted, and Ariarathes obliged to abandon the kingdom to his rival <sup>w</sup>. Orophernes, being thus put in possession of Cappadocia, dispatched ambassadors to Rome with a golden crown of great value, which the senate declined to accept, till such time as they heard his pretensions to the kingdom of Cappadocia, which he by suborned witnesses made appear so plain, that the senate decreed Ariarathes and he should reign together, as brothers and partners in the kingdom <sup>x</sup>. But Orophernes was the same year driven out by Attalus, brother to Eumenes, and his successor in the kingdom of Pergamus, and Ariarathes restored to the intire possession of his paternal kingdom. Orophernes being driven out, Ariarathes sent ambassadors to demand of the Prienians four hundred talents, which Orophernes had deposited with them. The Prienians honestly replied, that as they had been trusted with the money, they could not, without breach of the trust reposed in them, deliver it to any one except Orophernes himself, or such as came in his name. Hereupon the king entered their territories in a hostile manner, and putting all to fire and sword, thought he should frighten them into a compliance with his demands. But neither his threats, nor the calamities they suffered, could prevail upon them to betray their trust; nay, in the height of their miseries, while their city was besieged by the joint forces of Ariarathes and Attalus, they found means to restore the intire sum to Orophernes, though the king had threatened them with utter destruction, in case it was not delivered to him upon his entering the city, which he hoped to be master of in a few days. But in the mean time the Prienians recurring to the Romans, the two kings were enjoined by the legates to raise the siege, and withdraw their forces, on pain of being deemed enemies to the republic<sup>1</sup>. Ariarathes readily complied with the legates orders, and marching his army into Syria joined Alexander Epiphanes against Demetrius Soter, by whom he had been formerly driven out of his kingdom. In the very first engagement Demetrius was slain, and his army intirely routed and dispersed, Ariarathes having on that occasion given uncommon proofs of his courage and conduct. Some years after a war breaking out between the Romans and Aristonicus, who claimed the kingdom of Pergamus in right of his father, he assisted the former to the utmost of his power, and was slain in the same battle in which P. Crassus, proconsul of Asia, was taken, and the Roman army cut in pieces. He left six sons by his wife Laodice, on whom the people of Rome bestowed Lycaonia and Cilicia. But Laodice fearing lest her children, when they came of age, should take the government out of her hands, poisoned five of them, the youngest only having escaped her cruelty by being privately conveyed out of the kingdom. Laodice was soon after put to death by the Cappadocians, who could not brook her cruel and tyrannical government, and the young king placed on the throne of his ancestors<sup>2</sup>.

Ariarathes VII. soon after his accession to the crown married Laodice daughter to Mithridates the Great, in hopes of having in that prince a powerful friend to support him against Nicomedes king of Bithynia, who laid claim to part of Cappadocia. But Mithridates, without any regard either to friendship or affinity, suborned, one Gordius to poison him, and on his death seized the kingdom under pretence of maintaining the rights of the Cappadocians against Nicomedes, till the children of Ariarathes were in a condition to govern and defend the kingdom by themselves. The Cappadocians were at first very thankful to Mithridates, as not entertaining any manner of suspicion against him; but finding him unwilling to resign the kingdom to the lawful heir, they rose up in arms, and driving out all his garisons, placed on the throne the eldest son of their deceased king, viz.

Ariarathes VIII. who was soon engaged in a war with Nicomedes king of Bithynia, that prince laying claim to some of the provinces that bordered on his kingdom. In this war Mithridates joined his nephew, and not only forced Nicomedes to abandon Cappadocia, but stripped him of great part of his own dominions. A peace being at last concluded between the kings of Bithynia and Cappadocia, Mithridates seeking some pretence to quarrel with Ariarathes, insisted upon his recalling Gordius, who had murdered his father; which proposal he rejecting with adhorrence, both princes began to prepare for war. Mithridates took the field the first, hoping to over-run Cappadocia, before Ariarathes could be in a condition to make head against him. But contrary to his expectation, he was met on the frontiers by Ariarathes at the head of an army no-ways inferior to his own. Hereupon having recourse to snares, he invited Ariarathes to a conference; and in the sight of both armies stabbed him with a dagger, which he had concealed under his garment, as we have related elsewhere. This struck such terror into the Cappadocians, that they immediately dispersed, and gave Mithridates an opportunity of possessing himself of the kingdom, without the least opposition. But he did not long enjoy his unjust conquests; for the Cappadocians, not being able to endure the tyranny and cruelty of his prefects, shook off the yoke, and recalling the king's brother, who had fled into the province of Asia, proclaimed him king.

Ariarathes IX.

Ariarathes IX. was scarce warm in his throne, when Mithridates invaded his kingdom at the head of a very numerous army; and having drawn him to a battle, defeated his army with great slaughter, and obliged him to abandon the kingdom to the conqueror. The king soon after died of grief, and Mithridates bestowed Cappadocia on his own son, who was then but eight years old, giving him also the name of Ariarathes <sup>2</sup>. But Nicomedes Philopator, king of Bithynia, fearing lest Mithridates, having now got possession of the whole kingdom of Cappadocia, should invade his territories, suborned a youth to pass himself upon the senate for the third son of Ariarathes, and to present them a petition in order to be restored to his father's kingdom. With him he sent to Rome Laodice, sister to Mithridates, whom he had married after the death of her former husband Ariarathes. Laodice declared before the senate that she had three sons by Ariarathes, and that the petitioner was one of them; but that she had been obliged to keep him concealed, lest he should undergo the same fate as his brothers. The senate assured him that they would at all adventures reinstate him in his kingdom; for the whole matter was carried on with such craft, that they had not the least suspicion of any deceit. But in the mean time Mithridates having notice of these transactions, dispatched Gordius to Rome to undeceive the senate, and persuade them, that the youth, to whom he had resigned the kingdom of Cappadocia, was the lawful son of the late king, and grandson to that Ariarathes who had assisted the Romans against Aristonicus, and lost his life in their service <sup>a</sup>. This unexpected embassy put the senate upon inquiring more narrowly into the matter, whereby the whole plot was discovered, and Mithridates ordered to resign Cappadocia. Paphlagonia as wat the same time taken from Nicomedes, and both kingdoms declared free. But the Cappadocians sent ambassadors to Rome, acquainting the senate, that they could not live without a king, which the senate was greatly surprized at; but however humouring their inclination, gave them leave to elect a king of their own nation, for the royal family of Pharnaces was now extinct. They chose unanimously Ariobarzanes, and their election was approved by the senate, he having, on all occasions, shewn himself a steady friend to the Romans <sup>b</sup>.

dom, when he was driven out by Tigranes king of the Greater Armenia, who resigned it to the son of Mithridates, according to the articles of an alliance previously concluded between these two princes. Ariobarzanes fled to Rome, and having engaged the senate in his cause, he returned into Asia with Sylla, who was enjoined to restore him to his kingdom; which he did accordingly, having with a small body of men routed Gordius, who came to meet him on the borders of Cappadocia at the head of a numerous army. But Sylla had scarce turned his back, when he was driven out anew by Ariarathes, the son of Mithridates, on whom <sup>c</sup>Tigranes had bestowed the kingdom of Cappadocia. This obliged Sylla to return into Asia, where he was attended with the same success, and Ariobarzanes placed again on the throne. After the death of Sylla he was the third time forced by Mithridates to abandon his kingdom, but was soon restored by Pompey, who, after having intirely defeated Mithridates near mount Stella, rewarded Ariobarzanes, for his services during the war, with the provinces of Sophene, Gordiene, and great part of Cilicia. But he being now advanced in years, and desirous to spend the remainder of his life in ease and free from cares, resigned the crown to his son Ariobarzanes in presence of Pompey, and never afterwards interfered with public affairs. Tully in one of his letters seems to insinuate as if he had been killed <sup>c</sup>.

Ariobarzanes II. Ariobarzanes II. proved a no less faithful ally and friend to the Romans than his father had been. He was very serviceable to Cicero, as he himself witnesses, during the time he was proconsul of Cilicia. The civil war breaking out between Cæsar and Pompey, he sided with the latter; but after the death of Pompey was received into favour by Cæsar, who even bestowed upon him great part of Armenia. While Cæsar was engaged in a war with the Egyptians, Pharnaces king of Pontus invaded his territories, and stripped him of his paternal kingdom, as well as of his new acquisitions. But Pharnaces being overcome by Cæsar, he was not only restored to his kingdom, but honoured with new titles by the Romans. After the murder of Cæsar he refused to join Cassius and Brutus, who thereupon having declared him an enemy to the republic, invaded his dominions; and having taken him prisoner, caused him to be put to death.

Ariobarzanes III. He was succeeded by his brother Ariobarzanes III. who as we have elsewhere mentioned, was by Marc Antony deprived both of his life and kingdom. In him ended the family of Ariobarzanes.

Archelaus. Archelaus the grandson of that Archelaus, who in the Mithridatic war commanded in chief against Sylla, as we have mentioned above, was by Marc Antony placed on the throne of Cappadocia, though no-ways related either to the family of Pharnaces, or that of Ariobarzanes. His preferment was entirely owing to his mother Glaphyra, a woman of great beauty, but of a very loose behaviour; who having gained Antony's good graces by indulging his lust, obtained by way of reward for her compliance the kingdom of Cappadocia for her son. To this alludes the epigram of Augustus related by Martial <sup>d</sup>. In the war between Augustus and Antony he joined the latter; but at the intercession of the Cappadocians was not only pardoned by Augustus, but received from him Armenia the Lesser and Cilicia Trachea, for having assisted the Roman prætors in clearing the seas of pirates, who greatly infested the coasts of Asia. He contracted a strict friendship with Herod the Great, king of Judæa, and even married his daughter Glaphyra to Alexander, Herod's son. Herod becoming jealous of his son, as if he aspired to the kingdom, Archelaus took a journey into Judæa, with no other view but to remove his suspicions, and reconcile him to his son; which he happily effected, though on account of new suspicions Alexander was not long after by his father's order put to death. Herod accompanied in person Archelaus on his return.

into Cappadocia as far as Antioch, where he recommended him to Titus, then president of Syria, as the best friend he had. After the death of Alexander, Archelaus gave his children a princely education, and shewed a particular tenderness and concern for them till the day of his death. In the reign of Tiberius he was summoned to appear before the senate; for he had been always hated by Tiberius, because in his retirement at Rhodes he had paid him no sort of court or distinction; which proceeded from no pride or aversion to Tiberius, but from the warning given him by his friends at Rome. For Caius Cæsar, the presumptive heir to the empire, then lived, and had been sent to compose the affairs of the east. Whence the friendship of Tiberius was then reckoned dangerous. But when he came to the empire, remembering how Archelaus had behaved, he enticed him to Rome by means of letters from Livia, who, without dissembling her son's resentment, promised him his pardon, provided he came in person to implore it. He obeyed the summons, and hastened to Rome, where he was received by the emperor with great wrath and contempt, and soon after accused as a criminal in the senate. The crimes alledged against him were mere fictions; but his concern in seeing himself treated like a malefactor was so great, that he died soon after of grief, or, as others say, laid violent hands on himself*. He is said to have reigned fifty years. Pliny tells us†, that he wrote a book of agriculture. Upon his death the kingdom of Cappadocia was reduced to a province, and governed by those of the equestrian order (Y).

(Y) Other authors tell us, that Archelaus would have been condemned by the servile senate, had not one of the evidences produced against him deposed, that he had heard him say, If ever he went back into Cappadocia, Tiberius should feel what nerves he had; which moved such a laughter in the senate, the old king, by reason of the gout and other distempers, not being able to stand by himself, that he was dismissed; Tiberius thinking that he could not punish him more effectually than by suffering him to live. This favour, say they, the old king continued in the best manner, and out of gratitude bequeathed his kingdom to Rome.

TH E city of Pergamus we have already described in our history of Mysia, to which province it formerly belonged, and was subject to the same princes, till it became the metropolis of a separate kingdom. We shall therefore only add here the history of the Pergamenian kings, who from small beginnings came by degrees to make a considerable figure among the potentates of Asia, and proved very serviceable to the Romans in all their Asiatic wars.

THE first of this family we find mentioned in history was one Philetærus, an eunuch, by birth a Paphlagonian, of a mean descent, and in his youth a menial servant to Antigonus, one of Alexander's captains. He afterwards served Lyfimachus king of Thrace and Macedon, who appointed him keeper of his treasures lodged in Pergamus. While he held this employment, Lyfimachus, at the instigation of his wife Arfinoe, barbarously murdered his son Agathocles, who had attended him in all his wars, and by whose conduct he had gained most of his victories. His death was publicly lamented by Philetærus, who was chiefly indebted to him for his preferment. Whereupon Arfinoe highly incensed against him, found means to work him by degrees out of his master's favour; which he being apprized of, seized on the castle of Pergamus, and the treasures which he had been intrusted with, to the amount of ninety thousand talents, which he proffered with his service to Seleucus king of Syria. But both Lyfimachus and Seleucus dying soon after, he kept the treasures, and with a strong body of mercenaries held the town till his death, which happened twenty years after he had revolted from Lyfimachus. He died in the eightieth year of his age, and is by some styled prince, by others king of Pergamus; he was at least the founder of this new kingdom, though though perhaps he never assumed the title of king. He left Eumenes the kingdom to Eumenes his brother, or, as some write, his I. brother's son, who laying hold of the dissensions that reigned among the Seleucidæ, invaded Asia, possessed himself of many strong-holds in that province, and having hired a strong body of Galatians, defeated Antiochus as he was returning home, proud with a remarkable victory which he had gained over his brother Seleucus Callinicus &c. This victory put him in possession of the greater part of Asia; but he did not long enjoy his new acquisitions, for he died the next year of immoderate drinking, a vice which he was greatly addicted to, in the twenty second year of his sovereignty; for we do not find that he ever took upon him the title of king.

Eumenes was succeeded by Attalus I. the son of Attalus, Attalus I. brother to Philetærus by Antiochis the daughter of Achæus. For Attalus, though of a mean descent, being plentifully supplied with money by his brother Philetærus, visited most of the courts of the Asiatic princes, and was every-where had in great esteem, being a man of excellent natural parts. He proved so serviceable to Achæus, who, revolting from Antiochus the Great, assumed the title of king, that he bestowed upon him his favourite daughter Antiochis. By her Attalus had one son named also Attalus, who upon the death of Eumenes took possession of Pergamus, and the places which he had added to his small principality. In the very beginning of his reign he routed the Gauls with great slaughter, and forced them to abandon his territories, where they had proposed to settle. After this victory he took upon himself the title of king, and as such was acknowledged by all the neighbouring princes (Z). Livy tells us that he was the first among the Asiatic princes who refused to pay contribution to the Gauls,

(Z) The crown continued in his family to the third generation, of which Suidas relates an answer given him by the oracle of Delphos, in these words: Go on Taurocerus; you shall wear a crown, and your son's sons, but to no other shall it pass. He was called Taurocerus from a pair of bull's horns, which were put we know not by whom, on the head of his statue. He was also called the son of a bull by another oracle, wherein it was foretold that he should one day make a great slaughter of the Gauls; the answer of the oracle is related by Pausanias in the following words (72): Jupiter shall quickly send them a deliverer, the son of a bull, educated by Jupiter, who shall bring a dismal day on the Gauls.

whom he worsted in a pitched battle<sup>2</sup>. While Seleucus Ceraunus was employed in other wars he raised a powerful army, and entering Asia, subdued all the provinces on this side mount Taurus. But was soon driven out of his new acquisitions by Seleucus, and his grand-father Achæus, who entering into an alliance against him, stript him of all his dominions, and even besieged him in his metropolis. Attalus finding himself thus reduced to the last extremity, invited with great promises the Gauls, who had settled in Thrace, to his assistance, who marching with all speed to Pergamus, obliged the enemy to raise the siege, and being headed by the king himself, recovered in a short time all the cities and provinces which they had seized. Attalus having thus recovered what the enemy had taken, while Achæus was busy in Paphlagonia, he marched into Ionia, and the neighbouring provinces, where the cities of Cuma, Smyrna, and Phocæa voluntarily submitted; the Teians, Colophonians, with the inhabitants of Egea and Lemnos, sent deputies, declaring themselves ready to acknowledge him for their sovereign; the Carfenians on the other side the river Lycus opened their gates to him, having first driven out Themistocles, whom Achæus had appointed governor of those provinces. From thence he advanced to Apia, and encamping on the banks of the river Megistus, received homage from all the neighbouring nations. Here the Gauls, being frightened with an eclipse of the moon, refused to pursue their march, which stopt the career of his conquests, and obliged him to return to the Hellepont, where he gave the Gauls leave to settle, and allowed them a large and fruitful territory, assuring them that he would always assist and protect them to the utmost of his power. Having thus enlarged his dominions, he returned to Pergamus, where he received with great pomp and magnificence the Roman legate Lævius, and entered into an alliance with Rome, which secured to him all his acquisitions. In the reign of Attalus a certain prophecy was found in the sibylline books by the college of the Decemviri, to whose care those books were intrusted, to this purport: Whensoever a foreign enemy shall invade Italy, he shall be driven out and overcome, if the image of the great mother of the gods at Ida, which fell from heaven, be sent for and brought to Rome. Whereupon five embassadors were without delay dispatched to Attalus, who received them with all possible marks of friendship and kindness, and attending them in person to

Pessinus in Phrygia, there delivered into their hands a stone which the inhabitants worshipped as the great mother of the gods<sup>h</sup>. He joined the Romans in both their wars with Philip king of Macedon, who invaded his dominions, laying waste whole provinces, but was not able to reduce one city. In the second war Attalus had the command of the Rhodian fleet, with which he not only drove the Macedonians quite out of the seas, but even, in conjunction with his allies the Athenians, invaded Macedonia, and obliged Philip to march off from Athens, which he had greatly distressed, in order to defend his own kingdom. For which services the Athenians heaped upon Attalus all the favours they could, and even called one of their own tribes after his name, an honour which they had never before bestowed upon any foreigner<sup>i</sup>. He died of His death. an apoplexy, which seized him at Thebes in Bæotia, while he was making an harangue to the Bæotians, and exhorting them with more vehemency, than his age and strength could bear, to enter into an alliance with the Romans against Philip their common enemy. In the midst of his harangue he fell down speechless; but returning to himself, desired to be carried by sea from Thebes to Pergamus, where he died soon after his arrival<sup>k</sup>, in the seventy second year of his age, and forty third of his reign. He was a great encourager of learning, and wrote himself some books, which are often quoted by Pliny, Artemidorus, and Strabo. He caused the grammarian Daphidas to be thrown headlong from a high rock for speaking disrespectfully of Homer<sup>l</sup>. His generosity towards men of learning knew no bounds, whence he is highly commended by all the writers that flourished in his time; as is also his wife Apollonias, or, as others call her, Apollonis, whom, though of a mean extraction, they propose as a pattern of all princely virtues. By her he left four sons, Eumenes, Attalus, Philetærus, and Athenæus<sup>m</sup>.

He was succeeded by Eumenes his eldest son, who upon his accession to the crown renewed the alliance which his father had made with the Romans, and observed it so religiously, that Antiochus the Great having proffered him his daughter Antiochis in marriage, he declined his affinity, being apprised that Antiochus courted his friendship with a view to strengthen himself by his alliance against the Romans; for his eldest daughter he had bestowed on Ptolemy king of Egypt, and of-

ferred the second to Ariarathes, king of Cappadocia, and was at that time making great preparations for war both by sea and land.<sup>a</sup> Eumenes, who was very jealous of so powerful a neighbour, did not fail to acquaint the senate with all his motions, who thereupon sent P. Villius, and P. Sulpitius, under appearance of an embassy to Antiochus; but really to inform themselves of the preparations he was making, and by often conversing with Hannibal, who was then in great esteem with Antiochus; either to abate his hatred towards the Romans, or make Antiochus jealous of him; for they apprehended Hannibal to be at the bottom of those vast preparations.<sup>o</sup> The ambassadors went first to Elæa, and from thence to Pergamus; for their instructions were to confer with Eumenes, before they went to the court of Antiochus. Eumenes did all that lay in his power to inflame them against Antiochus, assuring them, that he had nothing less in view than the empire of all Asia. Soon after the departure of the ambassadors, who returned very much dissatisfied with Antiochus, Eumenes sent his brother Attalus to Rome, to acquaint the senate, that Antiochus at the persuasion of the Ætolians had passed over into Greece with an army consisting of ten thousand foot, five hundred horse, and six elephants, and that the Ætolians were all to a man ready to join him. The senate received Attalus with the greatest demonstrations of friendship and kindness, returned thanks both to him and the king his brother, provided him with lodgings at the expence of the public, and dismissed him loaded with presents, promising to send an army into Greece, which should defeat the king's measures, and keep in awe the Ætolians. Which they did accordingly, sending M. Acilius consul into Greece, who having vanquished Antiochus at Thermopylae, obliged him to fly back into Asia.<sup>p</sup> In this war Attalus was appointed to command the Roman fleet; and his brother Eumenes assisted the Romans both with his navy, and all the land-forces he could raise. As the fleet of Antiochus was returning from Greece into Asia under the command of Polyxenidas, they happened to fall in with the Roman fleet, commanded by Eumenes and C. Livius Salinator, who falling upon them sunk ten of their ships, took thirty, and dispersed the rest. This victory was in great measure owing to Eumenes, who boarded some of the enemies ships in person, and during the whole action behaved himself with uncommon bra-

Very. Sometime after Eumenes, with a body of five thousand men, entered the territories of Antiochus, and having laid waste all the country about Thyatira, returned to Canas, where the Roman fleet wintered, with an immense booty. While Eumenes was thus employed in aiding the Romans abroad, he was unexpectedly called home to the defence of his own country. For Antiochus invading his territories, laid waste the whole country about Elæo, and even sent his son Seleucus to lay siege to the royal city of Pergamus. Attalus, the king's brother, held out with a handful of men, till the Achæans, the allies of Eumenes, sent a thousand foot and an hundred horse to his assistance. These were all chosen troops, who had served under Philopæmen, and were commanded by Diophanes, a man of great experience in war. Diophanes observing from the walls of the town the carelessness of the enemy, obtained leave of Attalus to march out of the city, and encamp at a small distance from them. Both Attalus and the citizens of Pergamus looked upon him as a mad-man, who durst venture out while the city was besieged by an army ten times their number. The enemy likewise were not a little surprized at first; but finding that he kept himself quiet in his camp, they returned to their former negligence and disorders, not imagining that with such a handful of men he would make any attempt upon their camp. Which Diophanes observing, sallies out unexpectedly at the head of an hundred horse, and having put in disorder their advanced guards, attacked Seleucus in his camp, and the Achæan foot coming up in the mean time, drove the whole army from their posts, and pursued them with great slaughter as far as he could safely venture without losing a man. The next day Seleucus encamped at a greater distance from the town, and, drawing out his men, offered the enemy battle; but Diophanes kept quiet in his camp, till Seleucus, despairing to draw him to an engagement, began to march his forces back to the camp, when falling upon their rear with his horse, he pursued them to their trenches with greater slaughter than he had done the day before. The boldness of the Achæans struck such terror into the enemy, that Seleucus thought fit to abandon the siege, and retire. Attalus and the Pergamenians beheld from the walls of the town, and admired the gallant behaviour of the Achæans, but had not the courage to venture out, which if they had done, the army of Seleucus might have been that day easily cut in pieces. This cowardly behaviour reflected no small dishonour on Attalus, though he had on all other occasions behaved with uncommon gallantry'. In the mean time Eumenes himself arriving at Pergamus, and the Rhodian and Roman fleets joining that king's, Antiochus and his son Seleucus retired with great precipitation out of his territories; and hearing that the consul L. Scipio was ready to pass over into Asia with all his forces, dispatched ambassadors to L. Emilius, who commanded the Roman army, to sue for a peace. Emilius sent for Eumenes to advise with him in this conjuncture, as he likewise did with Eudamus and Pamphilidas, commanders of the Rhodian fleet. The Rhodians were not against a peace; but Eumenes, who would hearken to no terms, persuaded Emilius to dismiss the ambassadors with this answer; that no peace could be concluded before the arrival of the consul; for L. Scipio was then in full march to join them. Antiochus seeing there was no hopes of obtaining a peace upon honourable conditions, either of Emilius, or afterwards of Scipio, resolved to venture a general engagement, in which he was entirely defeated, in great measure, by the gallant behaviour of Eumenes, who not only bore, without giving ground, the first onset of the elephants, and armed chariots, but drove them back upon their own men; which putting the ranks in disorder, gave the Roman horse an opportunity of attacking them, and throwing the whole army into the utmost confusion. After this battle, which was fought at the foot of mount Sipylos, not far from Magnesia, Antiochus was glad to accept a peace upon any terms. One of the conditions was, that he should pay four hundred talents to Eumenes, and a certain quantity of corn, to make amends for the losses he had sustained during the war. The peace being concluded, Eumenes took a journey to Rome, where he represented to the senate, with a great deal of moderation, what he had done in the service of the republic, and told them, that he was come to beg of them, that the Greek cities, which at the beginning of the war were subject to Antiochus, might be added to his dominions, since in him they might promise themselves a faithful friend and ally, and look upon his new acquisitions as their own. His demand was warmly opposed by the Rhodian ambassadors and those of all the Greek cities in Asia. But both parties being heard, the senate after a long debate decreed, that all the countries on this side mount Taurus, which belonged to Antiochus, should be given to Eumenes, together with the other provinces lying between the mountain and the river Mæander, except Lycia and Caria, which were bestowed on the Rhodians. Moreover all the cities, which had been tributary to Attalus, were ordered to pay the same tribute to Eumenes; but such as had been tributary to Antiochus were declared free<sup>1</sup>. Eumenes having thus, by siding with the Romans enlarged his dominions, was soon after engaged in a new war with Prusias king of Bithynia, who confiding altogether in Hannibal, whom he entertained at his court, invaded his territories. But Eumenes being assisted by the Romans, gave him two great overthrows, one by sea, and the other by land, which so disheartened him, that he was ready to accept of a peace upon any terms whatsoever. However, before the conditions were agreed upon, Hannibal found means to draw Philip king of Macedon into an alliance against Eumenes, and the Romans. Philip, who was highly incensed against the Romans, who had obliged him to evacuate the cities of Enus and Maronea in Thrace, and no less exasperated against Eumenes, on whom they had bestowed them, sent Philocles, an old and experienced officer, with a considerable body to join Prusias. Hereupon Eumenes sent his brother Athenæus to Rome, with a golden crown valued at fifteen thousand talents, to complain of Philip for aiding Prusias, and of Prusias, for making war upon the allies of the people of Rome without any manner of provocation. The senate accepted of the present, and promised to send forthwith ambassadors to settle matters to the satisfaction of Eumenes, whom they looked upon as the most steady friend the republic had in Asia. But in the mean time Prusias having ventured a sea-fight, obtained, by a contrivance of Hannibal's, a complete victory over Eumenes. For Hannibal advised him to fill a great many earthen vessels with various kinds of serpents, and other poisonous reptiles, and in the heat of the fight to throw them into the enemies ships, so as to break the vessels, and let the serpents loose. All the soldiers and seamen were enjoined to attack the ship, in which Eumenes himself was, and only defend themselves against the others as well as they could; and that they might not mistake the ship, a herald was sent before the engagement with a letter to the king. As soon as the two fleets drew near, all the enemies ships singling out the king's, discharged such a quantity of serpents against it, that neither the sailors nor soldiers could perform their duty, but were forced to fly to the shore, lest they should fall into the enemies hands. The other ships, after a faint resistance, followed the king's example, and were all driven ashore with great slaughter, the soldiers being no less annoyed by the stings of the serpents than the arrows of the enemies. Most part of Eumenes's ships were set on fire, several taken, and the others so shattered, that they could be of no further service. Eumenes encamped on the shore where he had placed some companies of foot; but the enemy did not think fit to abandon their ships <sup>t</sup>. Thus Prusias gained a complete victory by sea; and the same year two remarkable victories by land, which were intirely owing to Hannibal, who by one stratagem or another ever put Eumenes to flight. Having once advised Prusias to engage, and the king replying, that he durst not venture because the entrails of the sacrifices portended no good success; What, said Hannibal, do you rely more on the entrails of an undistinguishing beast, than on the judgment of an experienced commander? and commanding the signal to be given, put Eumenes to flight at the first onset <sup>u</sup>.

WHEN news of the defeat of Eumenes was brought to Rome, the senate immediately dispatched ambassadors to conclude a peace between the two kings, and to demand Hannibal who had stirred up Prusias to this war <sup>w</sup> (A). By the mediation of the Roman ambassadors a peace between the two kings was agreed on, and Prusias even consented that Hannibal should be delivered up to the Romans. That great general kept himself close in a castle which had been given him by Prusias. He had made seven doors in the castle, whereof some were private, and known to none but himself; for he entertained some diffidence of Prusias, and therefore had contrived those private out-lets, that he might be able to withdraw in case the king's soldiers should come to apprehend him. But this contrivance stood him in no stead; for the soldiers sent by Prusias surrounded the castle on all sides, which Hannibal observing had recourse to a present poison, which he ever carried about with him, and thereby prevented the ill treatment he was likely to meet with from the Romans (B).

A PEACE being thus concluded between Eumenes and Eumenes Prusias, a new war unexpectedly broke out between Eumenes and Ariarathes king of Cappadocia on one side, and Pharnaces king of Pontus and the Asiatic Gauls on the other. Pharnaces laying claim to some territories possessed by Eumenes, invaded his dominions, and seized on the city of Synope, which by the articles of a former treaty was to remain free. Hereupon Eumenes and Ariarathes his ally took the field, and in six days march arriving at Amisus in Cappadocia, encamped in sight of the enemy. But before they came to an engagement, news was brought of the arrival of the Roman legates, who had been sent by the senate to compose all differences in an amicable manner. Eumenes immediately dispatched his brother Attalus to welcome the Roman commissaries into those parts, and declared himself ready to refer all matters to their arbitration. But Pharnaces could by no means be prevailed upon to assist at any conference where Attalus was present; however he sent his ambassadors with full powers, declaring that he was willing to agree to such conditions as the Romans should think proper. But his ambassadors behaved in such manner as plainly shewed that Pharnates had no mind to come to any agreement. Whereupon the conferences were broke off, and Eumenes with the assistance of Ariarathes falling upon Galatia, reduced great part of that country; and was even preparing to invade Pontus, though he had sent at the same time a considerable body to the assistance of the Rhodians against the Lycians; refusing to live in subjection to their new masters. The success which attended the arms of the confederate kings, obliged at last Pharnaces to sue for a peace, which was granted on the following terms: that Pharnaces should forthwith march out of Galatia; and break off all former alliance with the Gauls; that he should likewise resign all the strong holds which he possessed in Paphlagonia; and send home without ransom such of the inhabitants as he had carried from thence; that he should restore to Ariarathes

By Libya or Libyssa Hannibal understood Libya in Afric; whereas the place meant by this oracle was a little village in Bithynia, near the sea-side, called by the same name, whereof Pliny (75) speaks thus: There was formerly in those parts a little town called Libyssa; where there is now nothing worth seeing except Hannibal's tomb.

By this treaty Mithridates king of Armenia was likewise to pay three hundred talents to Ariarathes for joining Pharnaces against him, contrary to an agreement between Mithridates and Eumenes †. Pharnaces no sooner gave hostages for the performance of these articles, but the armies broke up, and retired to their respective countries. Eumenes restored to Prusias the city of Teius in Pontus, which Prusias had resigned to him pursuant to the articles of agreement *.

Eumenes being thus delivered from any apprehension of war with his neighbours, entered into an alliance with Antiochus son of Antiochus the Great, king of Syria, whom Heliodorus after the murder of his brother Seleucus withheld from his paternal kingdom. Some writers say, that he began now to grow jealous of the too great power of the Romans, and to strengthen himself with other alliances, fearing they should at last prove as troublesome neighbours as Antiochus the Great had been to the kings of Pergamus †. But be that as it will, Eumenes with the assistance of his brother Attalus, drove out the usurper, and placed Antiochus on the throne of his ancestors. About the same time Eumenes falling out with the Rhodians his antient allies, not only stirred up the Lyicians to a revolt, but moreover made frequent inroads into their territories on the continent. Embassadors were therefore dispatched to Rome to complain of the violent proceedings of Eumenes. But as the king himself happened to go to Rome at the same time upon another errand, the Rhodian embassadors could not obtain any satisfaction for the damages they had suffered. Eumenes had undertaken this journey to acquaint the senate with the vast preparations which Perseus king of Macedon, to whom Eumenes bore an implacable hatred, was making both by sea and land. The king was received at Rome with the highest honours, and entertained in a manner suitable to his dignity. Being admitted into the senate, he made a long and elegant harangue, wherein he told them, that besides the desire he had of seeing the gods and men to whom he owed his kingdom, and his present happy situation, he had been induced to expose his person to so dangerous a journey by the mighty preparations which Perseus was carrying on with a design to drive the Romans out of Asia; he enlarged on this topic, and exhorted the senators with great vehemency to prevent the impending danger by falling upon the common enemy before he was in a condition to hurt them or their allies; he offered himself ready to assist them with men and money to the utmost of his power, and ended his speech with a modest rehearsal of his own services in behalf of the republic<sup>a</sup>. What he said on this occasion, and the senate's answer, were kept so secret, that no one knew the true motive of his journey to Rome, till the war was ended, and Perseus taken prisoner<sup>a</sup> (C). After Eumenes the ambassadors of the Rhodians were heard, who inveighed against Eumenes for encouraging and abetting the Lycian rebels, and told the senate, that Eumenes under the shadow of their power was become as troublesome to Asia as Antiochus himself. But as the Rhodians were grown somewhat out of favour with the Romans for having conveyed Laodice the daughter of Seleucus to her husband Perseus, their speech, tho' applauded by the Asiatics, rather enhanced the esteem and kindness of the senate to Eumenes, on whom they heaped all the honours they could, presented him with a stately chariot, and ivory staff, and sent him home loaded with rich presents<sup>b</sup>. On his return as he was going from Cirra to perform a sacrifice at Delphos, two assassins sent by Perseus rolled down two great stones upon him as he entered the straits of the mountains. With one he was dangerously wounded on the head, with the other in the shoulder. As he fell with the blows from a steep place, and thereby received many other wounds, those who attended him carried him on board of his ship, not well knowing whether he was dead or alive. (C) Valerius Antias writes, that Attalus brother to Eumenes, and not the king himself, came to Rome to give notice to the senate of the preparations which Perseus was making. But all other writers agree, that Eumenes came in person, and mention many particulars of his journey and reception at Rome. Among others they tell us, that Cato could not be induced to visit him, or shew him any kind of civility: and that being asked the reason of his peculiar conduct on that occasion, he answered, A king is by nature a carnivorous animal.

they conveyed him to Cirinth, and from Corinth to Ægina, having caused their vessels to be carried over the isthmus. There he was cured of his wounds with such secrecy, that none being admitted to see him, the report of his death was spread all over Asia, and even believed at Rome <sup>c</sup>. His brother Attalus being over-hasty in giving credit to the public fame, not only assumed the royal ensigns, but also married his brother's wife Stratonice daughter to Ariarathes king of Cappadocia. But not long after hearing that his brother was alive, and on his journey to Pergamus, laying down the diadem, he went to meet him, bearing an halbert as one of his guards. The king embraced both him and the queen with great tenderness, but is said to have whispered in his brother's ear; Don't be again in haste to marry my wife till you are sure that I am dead. Nor did he during his whole life ever do or say any thing else that could reflect on his brother's or wife's rash and imprudent behaviour, but shewed them the same love and tenderness as he had ever done <sup>d</sup>. The news of his recovery caused an universal joy at Rome, whence ambassadors were sent to congratulate him on his safe arrival into his own kingdom without any other commission or instructions. But Eumenes laying hold of that occasion, did all that lay in his power to inflame them against Perseus, and began himself, this treacherous attempt increasing his antient hatred and aversion to the Macedonians, to make vast preparations in order to join the Romans and their allies against the king of Macedon. His example was followed by Ariarathes king of Cappadocia, and the Romans drew into the same alliance Ptolemy king of Egypt, and Masaniissa king of Numidia. Perseus in the mean time sent ambassadors to Rome to clear himself of the crimes laid to his charge by Eumenes; they made an artful speech to the senate, but as they gave no satisfaction with relation to the treacherous attempt of their master upon the life Eumenes, a war was decreed against Perseus, and the ambassadors ordered to depart Rome the same day, and within thirty days all Italy <sup>e</sup>.

Eumenes upon advice that the Romans had at last declared war against Perseus sailed with his two brothers, Attalus and Athenæus to Chalcis in Bæotia, leaving his youngest brother Philetærus at Pergamus to defend his own dominions. From

Chalcis he marched into Thessaly, where he joined the consul Licinius with four thousand foot, and a thousand horse. Athenæus was left at Chalcis with two thousand foot to assist Marius Lucretius, who commanded a body of ten thousand men at the siege of Haliartus <sup>f</sup>. The town was taken and levelled with the ground, and great part of Bœotia reduced. The like success did not attend Licinius, Eumenes, and Attalus, in Thessaly, where they had two encounters with Perseus; in the first both parties claimed the victory, but in the second the Romans with their allies were put to flight, and Cassignatus, commander of the Gauls, with many other officers, killed on the spot <sup>g</sup>. After this defeat the consul retired to Larissa, and from thence sent Eumenes and Attalus home; the rest of his army he kept during the winter in Thessaly, in order to be ready to take the field early in the spring. In the mean time the Achæans foreseeing that with the kingdom of Macedon the liberties of Greece must inevitably fall, and in that view bearing a grudge to Eumenes, who had incensed the Romans against Perseus, abrogated by a public decree all the honours they had conferred upon him. Which Attalus, who then wintered at Elatia, no sooner heard, but he sent ambassadors to expostulate thereupon with the common council of the nation. After the ambassadors were heard, at the persuasion of Polybius the historian, a decree was made, whereby Eumenes was reinstated in all his antient honours, and ambassadors dispatched to Attalus with a copy of the said decree. In that council it was likewise decreed, that auxiliaries should be sent to the Romans; and Polybius was appointed to command them <sup>h</sup>. Thus Attalus prevailed upon the Achæans, not only to restore his brother to the honours they had conferred upon him, but also to join him and the Romans against the king of Macedon, whom they had favoured to that time.

EARLY in the spring Eumenes sailing with twenty ships from Elæa, joined on the coast of the Cassandrenses Marcus Figulus the Roman admiral, and invested both by sea and land the city of Cassandra, but was not able to reduce it. He likewise made unsuccessful attempts on the two strongholds, Toron and Demetrias, being obliged with considerable loss to retire from before them. As Eumenes about this time might. What alienated his mind from his antient allies, is uncertain ; but it is agreed on all hands, that from Demetrias he returned home, and could not, though earnestly entreated by the consul Marcus, be prevailed upon to leave behind him some troops of Gaulish horse, which would have proved very serviceable to the Romans. Some say, that a reconciliation between him and Perseus was privately negotiated by one Cydas of Crete, and Antimachus governor of Demetrias. For Cydas, who was greatly in favour with Eumenes, had had private conferences at Amphipolis with one Chimaras, likewise of Crete, and greatly addicted to Perseus, and at Demetrias had conferred with Menecrates, one of Perseus's commanders, and with Antimachus under the very walls of the city<sup>1</sup>. Others say, that having joined Marcus, as he had done the other consuls, he was very coldly entertained by him, and not suffered to encamp within the same trenches ; which he highly resenting, took his leave of the consul, and with his forces returned home to Pergamus<sup>2</sup>. Perseus no sooner heard that Eumenes had left the Romans, but he sent Cryphontes, as Polybius calls him, or Erapontes, as he is named in the printed copies of Livy, to propose conditions of agreement between him and Eumenes. Cryphontes represented to Eumenes that there could be no sincere friendship between a king and a free state ; that the Romans hated all kings alike, though they shewed the effects of their hatred to one only at a time, employing the forces and wealth of one king against another, with a design to compass the utter destruction of them all ; that they had reduced Philip with the assistance of Attalus, Antiochus with the help of Philip and Eumenes, and now designed to destroy Perseus with the forces of Eumenes and Prusias ; but when he was destroyed they would certainly fall upon Eumenes, whose territories lay next to theirs ; that they already pretended to be dissatisfied with him, in order to have a plausible pretence of treating him as they had treated other kings. Eumenes answered, that he apprehended no greater danger from the Romans than from Perseus, if he should happen to get the better of them. But however that he would stand neuter provided Perseus paid him a thousand talents, and for fifteen hundred talents more would persuade the Romans to hearken to conditions of an honourable peace. Perseus promised the sum required, but would not pay it before-hand, though Eumenes offered to give hostages for the performance of what he promised. Perseus finding that he could not prevail upon Eumenes but with ready money, offered to deposit the sum agreed on in a temple of Samothrace, whence it should be conveyed to him as soon as the peace was concluded. But as the island of Samothrace was subject to Perseus, Eumenes thought himself no surer of the money, while it was there, than if it had been kept in the king's treasures at Pella. Besides, he thought that his good offices deserved some acknowledgment, whether they were attended with success or no; and therefore insisted upon this, that part of the sum should be paid before he made any step in the affair. This Perseus, who mistrusted Eumenes, could not be brought to; and thus the conferences were broke off, but the subject of them kept secret, Eumenes having sent an express to the Roman consul, acquainting him that their negotiations were concerning the redemption of captives<sup>1</sup>. However, as the truth of the matter was soon after known by the Romans,

The Romans grow jealous of him. they began to entertain no small jealousy of Eumenes, and heap all their favours on his brother Attalus who had staid with the consul, and given undoubted proofs of his fidelity during the whole time of the Macedonian war. After the overthrow of Perseus, and utter destruction of the kingdom of Macedon, Eumenes sent his brother Attalus to congratulate the senate on the happy issue of that war, and at the same time to crave their assistance against the Asiatic Gauls, who began to be very troublesome neighbours. Attalus was received at Rome, and entertained in a princely manner. Several of the senators, who went to visit him before he had his audience, encouraged him to lay down the character of an ambassador from his brother, and treat for himself, assuring him, that, as the minds of the Romans were alienated from Eumenes, his brother's kingdom would be given to him, if he requested it of the senate. These promises at first awaked his ambition; for he approved or seemed to approve of the motion, and even promised to beg of the senate his brother's kingdom. But his honest nature was soon reclaimed by the wholesome admonitions of Stratius the physician, a man of great trust and authority with Eumenes, who had been sent with him to Rome as a trusty monitor, in case the Romans should tempt his fidelity. Stratius represented to him, that at present he reigned no less than his brother; and, in a short time considering, his brother's old age and infirmities, would have the kingdom entirely to himself without being guilty of rebellion; that the kingdom could scarcely be defended against the power of the Gauls by their mutual agreement, much less could they hold out against so warlike a nation, if their strength were impaired and divided by civil dissensions. These considerations had so good an effect upon Attalus, that when he was admitted into the senate, he first congratulated them on their victory over Perseus, then modestly rehearsed his own services during the Macedonian war, and lastly acquainted them with the motive of his journey, intreating them to send ambassadors to the Gauls, who by their authority might oblige them to lay down their arms, and forbear all hostilities against his brother Eumenes; he requested the senate, that the cities of Ænus and Maronea might be bestowed on himself. As he omitted to sue for his brother's kingdom, they supposed that he designed to ask another day of audience for that affair alone. Wherefore they not only granted him all his requests; but sent him more rich and magnificent presents than they had ever done to any before. Nevertheless Attalus took no notice of their meaning, but left Rome contented with what they had granted him already. His unexpected departure provoked the senate to such a degree, that while he was yet in Italy, they declared the cities of Ænus and Maronea free; thereby making their promise ineffectual; which otherwise they could not without shame revoke. And as for the Gauls, who were ready to fall upon the kingdom of Pergamus, they dispatched ambassadors to them with such instructions as rather encouraged than prevented their design<sup>m</sup>. Eumenes being informed by his brother of what had passed at Rome, thought it well worth his while to go in person and justify his proceedings before the senate. But his design being understood at Rome, a law was there enacted, that no king should be permitted to come to Rome; for they did not think it expedient to treat him as an enemy; and to entertain him as a friend was more than their displeasure for his ingratitude, as they styled it, would permit. Upon the first notice of his landing at Brundisium, the senate dispatched the quæstor to him with a copy of the edict, injoining him to acquaint the king, that if he had any thing to lay before the senate, he was commissioned to hear and propose it; but if he had no affairs to transact with the senators, to command him without delay to depart Italy. Eumenes understanding from the quæstor the pleasure of the senate, told him that he had no business of consequence to transact, and did not stand in any need of their assistance; and, without adding one word more, retired on board his ship and sailed back to Pergamus.

This treatment not only abated the courage of the king's friends, but animated the Gauls to invade his territories, seeing he could not expect any help from the Romans <sup>a</sup>. But Eumenes raising a powerful army, not only drove the Gauls out of his own dominions, but invaded at the same time Galatia and Bithynia, laying waste those countries, plundering the cities, and possessing himself of many strong-holds. Whereupon Prusias king of Bithynia sent ambassadors to Rome to complain of these violent proceedings, and acquaint the senate, that Eumenes had entered into an alliance with Antiochus king of Syria, and countenanced all those who shewed any aversion to the Romans <sup>b</sup>. With the ambassadors of Prusias came also those of the Gauls, of the Selgenses, and many other cities of Asia to accuse Eumenes, as if he kept a secret correspondence with Perseus, which was also confirmed by some letters, which the Romans themselves had intercepted. Eumenes fearing lest the senate should declare him an enemy, and join the Gauls and Prusias, charged his two brothers, Attalus and Athenæus, to clear him at Rome of the crimes objected to him by his enemies. They were both received with all possible marks of honour, but could not dissipate the jealousies which the senate had conceived against Eumenes. For not long after their departure, C. Sulpitius Gallus and Marius Sergius were sent into Asia in quality of legates, and enjoined to make a strict inquiry into the councils and designs of Antiochus and Eumenes. Sulpitius Gallus, upon his entering Asia, caused a proclamation to be made in all the cities of that province, whereby all those, who had any complaints against Eumenes, were ordered to repair to Sardis, where they should have justice done them. The legate himself arriving by the time appointed at Sardis, caused a tribunal to be erected in a public place, on which for ten days together he received all the accusations and complaints against Eumenes that were laid before him, as if he had been sent on purpose to pick a quarrel with the king. Eumenes, who was well apprised of his design, but unwilling to engage in a war against so powerful an enemy, especially in his old age, again sent his brother Attalus to Rome, hoping, that by his mediation he might be suffered to end his days in peace. Attalus did all that lay in his power to appease the wrath of the senators, and bring his brother again into favour. But all was to no purpose, they could by no means be prevailed upon to forget his behaviour during the Macedonic war, and seemed obstinately bent upon

Eumenes dies. his destruction. But their designs were prevented by the death of the king, which happened soon after the return of Attalus, to whom he bequeathed both his wife and his kingdom. He died in the thirty ninth year of his reign, leaving one son behind him, whom he had by Stratonice, the sister of Ariarathes king of Cappadocia. But he, being an infant at the time of his father's death, was incapable of governing the kingdom; and therefore Eumenes chose to put his brother Attalus into the present possession of the crown, reserving the next succession to his son <sup>p</sup> (D).

Attalus. Attalus was scarce seated on the throne, when Prusias, king of Bithynia, surnamed the Hunter, invaded, upon what provocation we know not, his dominions, and committing every-where most dreadful ravages, advanced to the very walls of Pergamus, overthrew Attalus in a pitched battle, and made himself master of the capital of his kingdom. He expected to have found Attalus in the city, but that prince having saved himself by a timely retreat, Prusias vented his rage upon the unhappy citizens, putting a great number of them to the sword, and setting fire to their houses <sup>q</sup>. Here-upon Attalus dispatched ambassadors to Italy to lay before the Roman senate the condition to which the kingdom of Pergamus was reduced. But Nicomedes the son of Prusias, who was then at Rome for his education, answered all the complaints that were made against his father, and even returned them against Attalus, as if he had been the aggressor. However, two commissioners were sent into the east to put an end to the disputes of the two kings on the spot: But Prusias, without paying them the least deference, continued ravaging the territories of Pergamus. Attalus therefore taking the advantage of the return of one of the ambassadors, sent his brother Athenæus with him to make new complaints to the senate. As he advanced nothing but what was confirmed by their own ambassador, the senators were at last convinced that

(D) Suidas calls him the greatest and most powerful king of his time. We have elsewhere made mention of his famous library at Pergamus, wherein were lodged two hundred thousand chosen books all collected by himself. These Marc Antony afterwards bestowed upon Cleopatra, by whose order they were carried from Pergamus to Alexandria.

Prusias

Prusias was the aggressor, and therefore sent him forthwith orders to withdraw his forces from the territories of Attalus. But Prusias under various pretences pursued the war for the space of three whole years, and reduced the kingdom of Pergamus to a most deplorable condition. At length he pretended to be ready to obey the decrees of the senate, and desired a conference with Attalus. At his request it was agreed, that the contending princes should meet on the frontiers of the two kingdoms, each attended by a guard of a thousand men, in order to put an end to their differences in the presence of the Roman envoys. But Prusias, who had no other view in this than to seize Attalus, marched his whole army to the frontiers, and concealing his troops behind the neighbouring hills, gave them orders to surround the Romans and Pergamenses, as soon as they should appear. But Attalus and the Romans, having timely notice of his design, saved themselves by flight, before the Bithynian forces could put the king's orders in execution. Prusias followed them to Pergamus after he had plundered the baggage of the ambassadors; and then marched to Elæa, a maritime city of Æolis, hoping to surprize it. But as the place was well garrisoned, and stored with all sorts of provisions, he did not think it adviseable to attempt the reduction of it. He therefore sent back his land-forces to Bithynia, and embarking on board his fleet set sail for Thyatira<sup>r</sup>.

THE senate, being upon the return of their ambassadors informed of these proceedings, were highly provoked against Prusias; but however, instead of declaring war against one who had affronted their ambassadors and despised their orders, they contented themselves with sending ten commissioners, whose number at least might make some impression on the Bithynian. Among these were L. Anicius, C. Fannius, and Q. Fabius Maximus. Their instructions were to put an end to this war, to oblige Prusias to satisfy Attalus, for the damages he had suffered by it, and to break off the alliance of the republic with the Bithynian, in case he did not acquiesce to the decree of the senate<sup>s</sup>. In the mean time Attalus, having got together a considerable army (for both Ariarathes king of Cappadocia, and Mithridates king of Pontus sent him underhand powerful supplies) took the field, and meeting the Roman ambassadors at Quada, marched directly against Prusias, who was advancing towards the frontiers of Pergamus at the head of a numerous army. request of the ambassadors came to a conference at a place equally distant from both camps. Prusias by many shifts and evasions endeavoured to amuse the ambassadors; but they, at length exerting themselves, told him, that he must either comply with the decree of the senate, or be declared an enemy to the republic; and accordingly, as he still persisted obstinate and untractable, they solemnly renounced the alliance and amity which had been between him and Rome. Prusias endeavoured to gain them by promises and submissions; but they were inflexible, and after having exhorted Attalus to continue upon the defensive, dispersed themselves in the several states of Asia, to assemble forces against the king of Bithynia. Rhodes, Cyzicum, and many other maritime cities, fitted out ships, and sent them to the assistance of Attalus; who having out of these reinforcements formed a fleet of eighty galleys, gave the command of it to his brother Athenæus, with orders to ravage the coasts of Bithynia; which he did accordingly, putting all to fire and sword, and carrying off an immense booty. Prusias, finding he could not hold out against the storm that threatened him, submitted to the decree of the senate, and accepted the terms which Rome sent him by three new ambassadors, viz. Appius Claudius, Lucius Oppius, and Aulus Posthumus. The terms were, that he should forthwith deliver up to Attalus twenty ships with decks, that he should pay him five hundred talents within the space of twenty years; that both of them should be contented with what they had before the breaking out of the war; and lastly, that Prusias should pay the Methymneans, Egeans, Cumæi, and Heracleans an hundred talents by way of reparation for the damages he had done them. These conditions being agreed on and signed by the contending parties, Attalus returned to Pergamus with all his sea and land-forces, and Prusias into Bithynia, after having evacuated all the cities and strong-holds which he had taken during the war<sup>c</sup>.

Attalus, being thus by the assistance of the Romans delivered from so dangerous a war, sent his nephew, the son of Eumenes, named also Attalus, to thank the senate for their kind offices, and to renew the friendship and alliance which had been formerly between his father and the people of Rome. Young Attalus was received by the senate with all possible marks of distinction, the ancient treaties with his father were renewed, and he loaded with presents sent back to his uncle, all the cities of Greece, through which he was to pass, being ordered to receive and treat him in a manner suitable to his condition.<sup>u</sup>

Prusias having discharged part of the sum which he was to pay to Attalus, hoped by the interest of his son Nicomedes, who resided at Rome and was in great favour with the senate, to prevail upon the senators to forgive the remainder. With this view he sent one Menas, a chief lord of his court, to Rome, in quality of ambassador; his instructions were to make use of Nicomedes's interest to gain his point; and in case he did not succeed, to dispatch Nicomedes, of whose great power at Rome he began to be jealous. For the more easy execution of this wicked design, he commanded two thousand men to embark with his ambassador; an extraordinary guard, but necessary to facilitate the escape of Menas after the assassination, and protect him after his return into Bithynia. Menas on his arrival at Rome employed Nicomedes to use his best offices with the senate; but Andronicus, the ambassador of the king of Pergamus, pleaded his master's cause so well, that the former decree of the senate was confirmed. What therefore remained was to put the barbarous orders of Prusias in execution, and murder Nicomedes. But as the young prince was greatly beloved at Rome, it seemed dangerous to notwithstanding the numerous guard which he concealed on board his ships, to make any attempt upon his life in the sight of the senate. After he had been long in suspense, not knowing what to do, he resolved at last to communicate to the son his father's design, and to turn the plot against the author and contriver of it. Accordingly Menas discovered to him his private instructions, and at his request imparted the whole matter to Andronicus the Pergamian ambassador who obtained leave of his master to transport Nicomedes into Asia on board his ship, that prince promising to take him under his protection, and support him against his father, who was no less intolerable to his neighbours, than to his own subjects. The two ambassadors sailed from Ostia much about the same time, and arrived, as it had been agreed on before-hand, at Berenice, a small city on the coast of Epirus. There they both landed their men under pretence of refreshing them after the voyage, and met privately to consult together with Nicomedes about the measures that might seem most proper for the execution of their design. The next morning Nicomedes, as it had been concerted the night before, went ashore in a purple robe, with the royal diadem on his head and a sceptre in his hand. Hereupon Andronicus, with an hundred men he had with him, saluted and proclaimed him king of Bithynia. Menas pretending to be surprized at this step assembled in great haste his two thousand Bithynians, and in an artful speech exhorted them to side with that party which was most likely to prevail, insinuating at the same time that Prusias was generally hated and Nicomedes beloved, not only by the Bithynians, but by the Romans and the subjects of the king of Pergamus, who were ready to assist him to the utmost of their power. Having ended his speech, he observed in the countenances of his men an unanimous determination to adhere to the young prince; whereupon seconding their inclination, he immediately joined the troops of Andronicus, and saluted Nicomedes king of Bithynia. After great shouts and repeated acclamations, they all reimbarqued, set sail, and landed in a port of the kingdom of Pergamus. Attalus received young Nicomedes with great joy, and immediately dispatched messengers to Prusias, requiring him to deliver up some provinces to his son, and fix certain revenues on him for his subsistence. To this demand the old king proudly answered, that Nicomedes should soon have the whole kingdom of Pergamus assigned to him<sup>w</sup>. But notwithstanding this haughty answer, he forthwith sent ambassadors to Rome, desiring the senate to send commissioners into Bithynia, and settle matters between him and Attalus in an amicable manner. But in the mean time Attalus, having encouraged Nicomedes to make war upon his father, by interpreting in his favour the answer of an oracle in Epirus, as if the god promised the young prince the kingdom of Bithynia*, took the field; and entering with Nicomedes the dominions of Prusias, was every-where received with great joy and loud acclamations. The king, not daring to trust his Bithynians, had recourse to Diegyles, one of the petty sovereigns of Thrace, whose daughter he had married for his second wife. But all the succours that prince could spare him were only five hundred men. With these he shut himself up in the city of Nicæa; but observing that the citizens were ready to revolt, and only waited for the arrival of Nicomedes and Attalus, he left that place, and took refuge in Nicomedia, which he thought strong enough to endure a long siege, not doubting but in the mean time ambassadors would arrive from Rome, and, by the interposition of their authority and good offices, make up matters between him and his son<sup>y</sup>. But he was herein greatly disappointed; for though his ambassadors on their arrival at

Rome desired an audience of the senate without delay, yet the prætor to favour Attalus, put it off under various pretences from day to day. At length he presented them to the conscript fathers, and being ordered to appoint three ambassadors to be sent into Bithynia, he made choice of such as were no-ways qualified for that commission; for they were men of no parts, and besides made a very ridiculous figure, one of them being strangely disfigured with scars, the other lame, and the third a mere idiot: whence the saying of Cato, that the Bithynian embassy had neither head, feet, nor understanding<sup>2</sup>. It may be easily imagined, that men of this figure and character had no great weight in the two courts. Attalus and Nicomedes made as if they were ready to submit to the authority of the senate; but the Bithynians, suborned underhand by them, openly declared, that they could no longer bear the tyranny of Prusias, and therefore intreated the ambassadors to return to Rome, and lay their complaints before the senate, not doubting but they should be able to settle Nicomedes on the throne, before any new resolutions could be taken by the conscript fathers. The ambassadors were easily prevailed upon to leave Bithynia, and return for new instructions to Rome. They were no sooner gone than Attalus and Nicomedes at the head of the Pergamian troops advanced to Nicomedia, which readily opened its gates to them, and left the old king at his son's mercy. Prusias, seeing himself thus deserted and betrayed by all, fled for refuge to the temple of Jupiter. But the holiness of the place could not screen him from the violence of his son, who, as he had been brought up at Rome, was tainted with the depravity of manners that prevailed there; for he no sooner heard that his father had taken sanctuary in the temple of Jupiter, but he sent thither assassins to murder him<sup>3</sup>. Diodorus Siculus<sup>b</sup> tells us, that the unnatural son killed him with his own hand; Strabo<sup>c</sup> charges Attalus with the death of Prusias; Dio Cassius and Zonaras say, that he was assassinated by his own subjects<sup>d</sup>; but Livy<sup>e</sup> divides the guilt of this heinous murder between Nicomedes and Attalus. The Romans took no notice of what had passed in Bithynia, but treated Attalus with the same kindness they had formerly shewn him, and suffered Nicomedes to enjoy peaceably the fruits of his wickedness. Soon after Attalus joined the Romans against Andriscus, who we read in that writer. Lucian and Zonaras accuse this prince of having dispatched his uncle Attalus with poison ; but other writers, without taking notice of any violence used on him, tell us, that he died in the eighty-second year of his age, leaving the crown to his nephew, whom he had brought up with great care. Varro<sup>m</sup> and Columella<sup>n</sup> reckon Attalus Philometor among those who have wrote of agriculture, and add, that he was skilled in physick, and had a thorough knowledge of simples. Hence some have conjectured, that the physician Attalus mentioned by Pliny<sup>o</sup>, was the king of Pergamus, since that author elsewhere<sup>p</sup> mentions him among those who have wrote of physick. At his death he left a will, whereby he made the Romans heirs of all his goods ; in virtue of this will the republic seized on his kingdom, reckoning that among his goods, and reduced it to a province, which was known by the name of Asia Propria or Proper Asia. Eudemus of Pergamus brought this will to Rome, and there delivered it to Tiberius Gracchus tribune of the people, together with the deceased king's crown and purple robes<sup>q</sup> (E). But Aristonicus, the next heir, did not tamely

(E) The words of Attalus's will, were, Populus Romanus bonorum meorum hæres esto ; Let the people of Rome be the heirs of my goods : These words the senate interpreted as comprehending his kingdom, which they reckoned among the king's goods. But some of the neighbouring princes, namely Mithridates king of Pontus (75), looked upon this will as a mere forgery ; others were of opinion, that the Romans, allowing it to be genuine, were in virtue of the abovementioned words intitled only to the deceased king's moveable goods, the kingdom itself belonging by right of succession to Aristonicus the only surviving prince of the blood royal. 'Tis true, he was the natural son of Eumenes ; but this, according to the custom which obtained among all the eastern princes, did not by any means debar him from the crown, when there were no lawful children to succeed to it. Horace among the Latin writers seems to insinuate, as Acron observes in his notes on that poet, that the Romans were intruders, and not lawful heirs to king Attalus in the following words :

tamely submit to the will which Attalus was said to have made. He was the son of Eumenes and brother of Attalus, though by another mother, viz. by an Ephesian courtesan, the daughter of a musician. As son of Eumenes, he laid claim to the crown, and having assembled a considerable army, he put himself in a condition to maintain his pretensions. With the assistance of a body of Thracians and Phocæans, whom he took into his service, he made himself master of some strong places, which opened him a way into the heart of the kingdom, where he was joined by great numbers of Pergamians, who being accustomed to a monarchical, dreaded a republican, government; and therefore, without minding the birth of their new leader, preferred his authority to that of a foreign prætor. Having by this means got together in a short time a numerous and powerful army, he besieged the places which were for maintaining the late king's will, and took the cities of Samos and Colophon in Ionia, and Myndos in Caria. The other places surrendered upon terms; so that he became, without meeting with any considerable opposition, master of the whole kingdom.

THIS news was brought to Rome about the time the people were to chuse consuls, and among the candidates were two men of great abilities, but whose employments seemed to render them incapable of making war in Asia. These were Licinius Crassus, high-pontiff, and Lucius Valerius Flaccus, flamen Martialis, or in other words, high-priest of Mars. Both obtained the consulship for which they stood, and were both very desirous of leading the armies of the republic into Asia, no commission being more profitable than that of commanding in those distant countries; but, after a sharp contest, it was determined in the comitia, that Crassus might, tho' pontifex maximus, head the armies of the republic in

That is, neither have I, an unknown heir, or an heir no ways related to Attalus, invaded his palace. It is not therefore true, that the kingdom of Pergamus belonged in strict equity to the Romans, that the republic had an indisputable right of dominion over the Pergamians, that Aristoniceus had no manner of claim to the kingdom of Attalus, as certain modern writers confidently affirm (77).

Asia;

Asia; and he was accordingly appointed to dispossess Aristonicus of the kingdom of Pergamus, and reduce it, agreeable to the late king's will, to a Roman province. Crassus, notwithstanding the intestine broils which then reigned at Rome, immediately set out for Asia; but as we find no mention made by historians of troops, fleets, or provisions sent with the consul, he, without all doubt, took it for granted, that the eastern kings and nations, in alliance with Rome, would furnish him with sufficient forces on the spot to drive out the usurper. On his arrival in Asia, he found that neither Syria nor Egypt were in a condition to lend him any assistance, both those kingdoms being at that time involved in great troubles. The consul therefore had recourse to the kings of Pontus, Cappadocia, Bithynia, and Paphlagonia, who all furnished him with troops; so that he advanced at the head of a numerous army, or rather of four armies, towards the frontiers of the kingdom of Pergamus<sup>1</sup>. Aristonicus did not care to engage the consul, but retiring as he advanced, suffered him to lay waste the country, in hopes of finding an opportunity of falling upon him unawares, which soon offered; for Crassus, who was a man of an avaricious temper, having got together an immense booty, began to retire from the inland parts of the kingdom towards the coast, in order to ship it off for Italy; but, as the season was far advanced, and the roads almost impassable, the army advanced very slowly; besides, the great number of waggons, loaded with the riches almost of the whole kingdom, retarded their march still more, and frequently occasioned a great confusion in the army; which Aristonicus being informed of, lay in wait for the consul in a narrow passage between steep hills, and there fell upon him when he least expected it. Crassus, tho' thus surprized, might have easily repulsed the enemy, having under his command a very numerous and well-disciplined army; but being wholly intent upon preserving the spoils, he unadvisedly thinned the ranks to put a stronger guard on them; so that the allies, being attacked by Aristonicus's men, with great vigour, and in a close body, were intirely routed. In the flight the consul himself was taken prisoner by a body of Thracians, between Elea and Myrina; but as they were carrying him in triumph to the camp of Aristonicus, he began to consider the reproach it would cast both on himself and his republic, if a consul and a pontifex maximus should become a slave to so despicable an enemy as Aristonicus, and on that consideration would have laid violent hands on himself, had he not been disarmed ; but as he had a rod in his hand to guide the horse on which he was mounted, he struck the soldier, who was nearest to him, so violently with it, that he beat out one of his eyes. Hereupon the Thracian, in a transport of rage, drew his sword, and, without further deliberation, run the consul through, and killed him on the spot. By this means Aristonicus was deprived of the pleasure of having a Roman consul and a pontifex maximus in his power ; however, the consul's head was carried to the enemy's camp, and there presented to Aristonicus, and exposed to public view ; but his body was honourably buried at Myrina, or as others will have it, at Smyrna <sup>c</sup>.

WHEN news of this defeat was brought to Rome, the tribes promoted two persons to the consulate, who were very unequal in rank, viz. C. Claudius Pulcher, a man of an illustrious family, and M. Perperna, a soldier of fortune. The latter was sent into Asia to revenge the death of the consul, and put an end to the Pergamian war. He appeared unexpectedly in the kingdom of Pergamus, where he found Aristonicus wholly intent on enjoying the fruits of his victory. Feasts, revels, and entertainments, after the Asiatic fashion, took up all his thoughts and time ; but he was soon roused out of his lethargy by the new consul, who having assembled, with incredible expedition, the troops of the allies, came unexpectedly upon him, and having obliged him to venture an engagement, gained a complete victory over him. Aristonicus, after the defeat, fled to Stratonice (F), where he had no sooner shut himself up, than the conqueror was before the place, which he blocked up on all sides, and, by that means, without exposing his men to the danger of an assault, reduced the garison to such straits, that they delivered both the city and their leader into his hands. The philosopher Blofius (G), who had assisted Aristonicus with his counsels during the whole course of the war, exhorted him to prefer a voluntary death to a shameful captivity, and encouraged him to it by dispatching himself in his presence; but he, like the other Asiatic princes, not having courage enough to lay violent hands on himself, even in the most calamitous circumstances, suffered himself to be carried to the consul, who kept him in chains to grace his triumph <sup>u</sup>.

(F) The ancient geographers mention three cities in Asia by this name. That which is here spoken of stood in Caria, and was, according to Strabo (78), originally a Syro Macedonian colony. It took its name, as Stephanus informs us, from Stratonice the wife of Antiochus Soter. The emperor Adrian, who rebuilt it, called it from his own name Adrianopolis ; but in the ancient notices it retained its old name. Strabo (79) mentions another city, bearing this name, in the neighbourhood of mount Taurus ; and Ptolemy a third, which he places in Mesopotamia.

IN the mean time new consuls being created at Rome, viz. C. Sempronius Tuditanus and Manius Aquilius, the latter was appointed to succeed Perperna in Asia, and put an end to that war, by reducing the kingdom of Pergamus to a Roman province. On his arrival he sent a proud message to Perperna, commanding him to deliver up to him Aristonicus, as belonging to his triumph rather than to Perperna's. This order Perperna refused to comply with, and his refusal was very likely to be attended with bad consequences; but his death, which happened soon after the arrival of Aquilius, decided the question. He had quite exhausted himself in pursuing Aristonicus, and hurrying from place to place after him; how-

(G) Blofius was a native of Cumæ, and a philosopher of great note. He warmly pressed Tiberius Gracchus, who had a great opinion of his integrity and understanding, not to drop his design of passing the famous Agrarian law. After the death of his friend Gracchus, he was cited to appear before the consul, and being asked why he had engaged in the party of the seditious tribune? he boldly answered, Because he thought it the most just. The consul further inquired, why he went so far as to be his agent? To this question the philosopher replied, That he did all that lay in his power to serve him, because he deserved to be served and obeyed. Would you then have burnt the capitol, said the consul, if he had ordered you to do it? Spare his memory, replied Blofius, with a surprizing confidence; he was not capable of so black an attempt; but if he had given me such an order, I should have certainly put it in execution, thinking his ordering it a sufficient proof of its being necessary for the public good (80). The intrepidity of Blofius surprized the consul, who found means to rescue him from the punishment which the senate had inflicted on the other friends of the tribune. He afterwards went over into Asia, where he assisted Aristonicus with his counsels; and, after having done all the mischief he could to the Romans, ended his life in the manner we have related.

ever, before his death, he took care to ship off for Rome all the treasures of the deceased king; which was a great disappointment to the consul Aquilius <sup>w</sup>.

THE Pergamians, notwithstanding the captivity of their leader Aristonicus, and the signal victory gained by the brave Perperna, still held out against the Romans, the fear of serving new masters, and receiving laws from a foreign republic, keeping the people every-where in arms; so that Aquilius was obliged to besiege almost all the cities of the kingdom of Pergamus, and reduce them one by one. As most of the cities of the kingdom of Pergamus had no other water but what was brought from far in aqueducts, the consul, provoked at their obstinate resistance, instead of demolishing the aqueducts, as was customary in war, poisoned the springs, and by that means spread death and desolation in the places he besieged. All the antients declare their detestation of this perfidious and inhuman way of waging war, condemning it as a most notorious infraction of the law of nature; but Rome, it seems, was not so much offended at it, since she suffered the cruel Aquilius, who practised it, to govern the kingdom of Pergamus, in quality of pro-consul for three whole years after his consulship was expired*. Aquilius having at last reduced the whole kingdom of Pergamus, the Roman senate appointed ten commissioners to settle it as a prætorian province, and put Aquilius at the head of the commission. By them this great state was divided into several districts, each of them depending on the metropolis, where the Roman prætor fixed his residence. The whole province comprehended Lydia, Caria, the Hellefpont, and the two Phrygias. Some of these countries were bestowed on the four kings who helped to conquer them. Lycaonia and Cilicia were given to the sons of Ariarathes, who was killed in this war. Phrygia Major, or the Greater Phrygia was, according to Justin <sup>y</sup>, conferred upon Mithridates Euergetes by the senate; according to Appian <sup>z</sup>, sold to that prince by Aquilius for a considerable sum of money, which the king paid on the spot. However that be, it is certain that, after the death of Mithridates, the senate took Phrygia from his son in his minority, and declared it a free and independent state. As for the unhappy Aristonicus he was led in chains before the triumphal chariot of Aquilius, as appears from the letter which Mithridates the Great wrote to Arfaces king of Parthia. The Romans, says he in that letter<sup>a</sup>, forging a will, whereby Attalus bequeathed to them his kingdom, led Aristonicus the son of Eumenes in triumph, for attempting to recover, by force of arms, his father's kingdom. Velleius Paterculus tells us likewise, that he was led in triumph by Manius Aquilius, and afterwards beheaded<sup>b</sup>. Strabo says, that, after the triumph, he was carried back to prison, and there strangled by an order from the senate<sup>c</sup>; and with him agree Eutropius<sup>d</sup> and Orosius<sup>e</sup>. It is therefore surprising, that certain modern writers<sup>f</sup>, in opposition to these glaring authorities, should tell us, that Aristonicus died before Aquilius triumph, which happened three years after the intire reduction of the Pergamian kingdom. Rome having thus reduced the kingdom of Attalus to a province, maintained from this time a perpetual intercourse with the Asiatics; and hence that inundation of vices of all kinds, which over-ran the whole state. The republic gained indeed a considerable increase of power and riches by this new conquest; but she paid dear for it in that universal depravation of manners which it introduced. Rome, says Justin<sup>g</sup>, gave law to Asia; but Asia, in her turn, revenged herself on Rome, by teaching the Romans refinements in debauchery, and profuseness in entertainments and furniture (H).

(H) Pliny looks on the conquest of Pergamus as the origin of the many disorders which afterwards prevailed in Rome. With the wealth of Pergamus, says he, debauchery, effeminacy, luxury, and all kinds of vices, came in crowds to Rome, and over-whelmed the capital of the world. Modesty and innocence were no longer countenanced in a city given up to the pleasures and delights of Asia. The citizens, dazzled with the splendor of the rich moveables that were shewn them, began to be ashamed of their antient simplicity. They picqued themselves on knowing how to value what their ancestors took pride in despising. They rivalled one another in the richness of their dress, in the furniture of their houses, and expence of their tables. Thus Asia, when subdued, had her full revenge on us, by bringing our city under a much worse yoke, that of effeminacy. Thus far Pliny (81), whose testimony is confirmed by Florus, Valerius Maximus, Seneca, Juvenal, and all the other writers who make any mention of the general dissolution of manners, which at this time began to reign, without restraint at Rome.

The History of THRACE.

THRACE, a country frequently mentioned by the Greek Name, Si-and Latin historians, derives its name, according to some tuation, writers, from Thrax the son of Mars; according to others, &c.
 from the barrenness of the soil, or the barbarity of the inhabitants, the Greek original bearing either of these significations <sup>h</sup>. Josephus, whose opinion seems to us the most probable, thinks it was called Thrace and Thracia, from Thyras the son of Japhet, who first peopled this country; for in his time it still retained the names of Thyras, Thyracia, and Thy- race, which, with a very small alteration, were changed into Thracia and Thrace<sup>i</sup>. His opinion is confirmed by Isido- rus <sup>k</sup>; St. Jerom<sup>l</sup>, Zonaras<sup>m</sup>, and most of the ecclesiastic writers, who all tell us, that Thracia was first called Thyracia, from Thyras, whose descendants first inhabited the large provinces comprehended under that name. It was bounded on the north by mount Hæmus; on the south by the Ægean sea; on the east by the Euxine sea, the Hellepont, and the Pro- pontis; and on the west by Macedon and the river Strymon<sup>n</sup>.
 Some of the antient geographers extend the bounds of Thrace far beyond the river Strymon and mount Hæmus. Pliny<sup>o</sup> carries its frontiers to the Ister or Danube; Appian joins it

Thrace. Mela tells us, that Abdera was founded by the sister of Diomedes; but Stephanus makes Hercules the founder of it, and adds, that he gave it the name of Abdera in memory of Abderus, one of his companions, who was devoured by the famous, or rather fabulous horses of Diomedes. In process of time a colony of Clazomenians settled there; whence the city is by some writers called also Clazomene. The Clazomenians were driven out by the natives, who suffered the Teians to live peaceably in Abdera, and other places of Thrace, after they had been driven out of their own country by Cyrus the Great; and hence Abdera is called by Strabo<sup>r</sup> and other writers a colony of the Teians. The Abderitani were looked upon by the antients as a dull, stupid people; but nevertheless their city gave birth to some great men, namely to Protagoras and the famous Democritus (I). This city is now generally known by the name of Polystylo, though Niger calls it Asperosa, and Nardus Astrizza. Near Abdera were the famous gold and silver mines spoke of by Plutarch<sup>r</sup>, Thucydides, Ammianus Marcellinus, and most of the antient historians and geographers. The place was called Scaptefyle. Stephanus says it was a small town, and places it over-against the island of Thasus. Here Thucydides, as Plutarch informs us<sup>r</sup>, wrote the history of the Peloponnesian war, his wife being a native of that place, as we read in Marcellinus<sup>u</sup>. On the same coast of the Ægean sea were the cities of Dicaea, Tiridu, Ismaros, Stryma, Maronea, and Ænos. The two last places were conquered by Philip the father of Perses, and upon the defeat of the latter by the Romans, promised by that republic to Eumenes king of Pergamus; but afterwards, for political reasons, declared by the senate free and independent<sup>w</sup>. On the Propontis were the cities of Macrontichos, Bisanthe, Ganos, Arzus, Perinthus, called afterwards Heraclea, Selymbria, and Bethynia. On the Thracian Bosphorus, Byzantium, and the port of Daphne. On the Euxine sea, Phinapolis, Phrygia, Philea, Aulæum, Apollonia, Anchialus, and Mesembria. By-

zantium, now known by the name of Constantinople, was founded according to Eusebius<sup>a</sup>, about the XXXth olympiad, while Tullus Hostilius reigned at Rome; but Diodorus Siculus will have the foundations of this city to have been laid in the time of the Argonauts, by one Byzas, who then reigned in the neighbouring country, and from whose name the city was called Byzantium<sup>y</sup>. This Byzas, if Eustathius is to be credited<sup>z</sup>, arrived in Thrace a little before the Argonauts came into those seas, and settled there with a colony of Megarenses. Velleius Paterculus ascribes the glory of founding this great metropolis to the Milesians<sup>a</sup>; and Ammianus Marcellinus to the inhabitants of Attica<sup>b</sup>. Some antient medals of Byzantium, which have reached our times, bear the name and head of Byzas, with the prow of a ship on the reverse, probably of that ship which brought him into Thrace. Justin was greatly mistaken, as to the origin and founder of this city, when he wrote, that Pausanias king of Lacedæmon built it, since it is certain that Pausanias took it from the Persians, who had made themselves masters of it before the king of Lacedæmon had ever set foot in Asia<sup>c</sup>. It underwent many revolutions, having been sometimes subject to the Persians, sometimes to the Lacedæmonians, and sometimes to the Athenians. It is not without reason that Byzantium was looked upon by the antients as the most pleasantly, and also the most conveniently situated for trade of any city in the world; but we shall have occasion hereafter to speak of it more at length. Perinthus was founded, according to Stephanus, by a companion of Orestes bearing that name, and afterwards called Heraclea, from Hercules, who conquered it. Ammianus Marcellinus tells us, that it was built by Hercules; but Marcianus of Heraclea will have it to be a colony of the Samians. Eusebius says it was founded in the XLIVth olympiad, which was many years after the time of Hercules. This city maintained its liberty against Philip the son of Amyntas, after all the other cities of Thrace had submitted to him.

THE inland cities of Thrace were, Jimphorina, the metropolis of the Mædi; Pantalia, the capital of the Danthe-litæ; Uscudama, the chief city of the Bessi; Philippopolis, built by Philip the father of Alexander, near the Hebrus; Nicopolis, founded by Trajan on the banks of the Nestus;

rivers.

THE mountains of this country, such as may be proper to take notice of are Hæmus, the highest of all the mountains in Thrace, and parting it from Lower Mysia to the north; Rhodope, the highest after mount Hæmus, and famous among the poets for the fate of Orpheus; Pangæus, separating Thrace from Macedon; and Orbelus, not far from the river Nessus. Hæmus and Rhodope are two long chains of mountains, running almost in a parallel line from the confines of Macedon to the Euxine sea. Pomponius Mela tells us, that, from one of the summits of mount Hæmus, one may discover the Euxine on one side, and the Adriatic on the other <sup>e</sup>; but herein he was certainly mistaken. The rivers of note are, the Hebrus, which springs from mount Hæmus, waters the territories of Philippopolis, Adrianopolis, Plotinopolis, and Trajanopolis, and discharges itself by two mouths into the Ægean sea, over-against the island of Samothrace; the Strymon, which rises on mount Pangæus, on the borders of Macedon, and falls into the same sea between Amphipolis and Oesima; the Nessus or Nessus, springing from mount Rhodope, and dissembling itself into the sea over-against the island of Thasus; the Melas, the Arzus, the Panyfus; the first emptying itself into the Ægean the second into the Propontis, and the third into the Euxine sea <sup>f</sup>.

The Thracian Cher-
sonesus.

THE Thracian Chersonesus is a peninsula, inclosed on the south by the Ægean sea, on the west by the gulf of Melas, and on the east by the Hellepont, being joined on the north to the continent by a neck of land about thirty seven furlongs broad. It contained the following cities, Cardia, Agora, Panormus, Alopeconnesus, Elæus, Sestus, Madytos, Cissa, Callipolis, Lyfimachia, and Pactye. Cardia was situated on the gulf of Melas, at the entrance into the peninsula, and so called, according to Pliny <sup>g</sup>, from its being built in the form of a heart. Agora, Panormus and Alopeconnesus stood on the same gulf; the latter was so called from the great number of foxes which infested its territory. Pliny <sup>h</sup>, misled by the name, which signifies in the original Greek the Island of foxes, took it to be an island ; but all the other geographers speak of it as standing on the Chersonesus. Elæus stood on the coast of the Hellepont over-against cape Mastasia, now Capo Græco. Callipolis, now Gallipoli, is placed by Strabo and Pliny on the coast of the Propontis, near the northern mouth of the Hellepont. It gives its name to the famous streights which divide Europe from Asia. Of Sestus and Lyfimachia we spoke in the histories of Persia and Syria. As for the other cities of the Chersonesus, they contain nothing worthy of notice.

THE inland parts of Thrace are very cold and barren, Soil. the snow lying on the mountains the greatest part of the year ; but the maritime provinces are productive of all sorts of grain, and necessaries for life, and withal so pleasant, that Mela compares them to the most fruitful and agreeable countries of Asia <sup>1</sup>.

THE antient Thracians were deemed a brave and warlike Manners, nation ; but of a cruel and savage temper, being, generally religion, speaking, quite strangers to all humanity and good-nature. &c.

In point of religion they scarce differed from the Macedonians their neighbours, adoring Jupiter, Hercules, Diana, Bacchus, and more especially Mars and Hermes or Mercury, by whose name alone their kings used to swear, pretending to be descended from him <sup>2</sup>. Herodotus gives us the following account of their customs and manners : When a child is born, his relations sitting round him in a circle, deplore his condition, on account of the evils he must suffer in the course of his life, enumerating the various calamities incident to mankind ; but when any one dies, they inter him with great rejoicing, repeating the miseries he has exchanged for a complete happiness. Among the Crestoneans, who inhabit the mountainous parts of Thrace, each man has many wives, who, at his death, contend warmly, being supported by their several friends, who shall be accounted to have been the most dear to the husband. In the end, she who is adjudged to have merited that honour, after having received great commendations, both from the men and women, is killed upon the grave by the nearest of her relations, and buried in the same tomb with her husband ; which is a great mortification to the rest, they being ever after looked upon by all with the utmost contempt <sup>3</sup>. The Thracians in general, as our historian tells us, sell their children, and take no care of their daughters, suffering them to live with whom, and in what manner they please ; nevertheless they keep a strict guard over their wives, and purchase them of their relations at a very great rate. To be marked on the forehead is honourable ; and a man without such marks is accounted ignoble. Idleness is esteemed an appendix of greatness ; husbandry is looked upon as unbecoming, and to subsist by war and rapine highly glorious. The funerals of eminent persons among them are celebrated in the following manner : they expose the dead body to public view for three days, during which time they perform their lamentations, and sacrifice to the infernal gods various sorts of animals. When the sacrifices are over, they either burn or bury the body in the ground, and having thrown up a mound of earth over the grave, they apply themselves to feasting, and celebrate all manner of combats and sports round the place <sup>m</sup>.

Government and inhabitants.

Thrace was antiently divided into numberless kingdoms quite independent of each other. Herodotus tells us, that if the Thracians had been either under the government of one prince, or unanimous in their counsels, they would have been the most powerful nation in the world ; but that they were no ways formidable, being divided, as it were, into many different nations, and ever at variance among themselves <sup>n</sup>. These different nations were the Dolonci, Denseletæ, Bessi, Bistones, Odomantes, Cicones, Edoni, Brygi, Thyni, Pieræ, Odrysæ, Autonomi, Crobyzi, Mædi, Sapæi, and Celetæ.

Dolonci.

The Dolonci were so called from Doloncus one of their kings, who according to Eustathius, first introduced polygamy among them <sup>o</sup>. At the time of Darius's expedition into Greece, they were possessed of the Thracian Chersonesus, and governed by princes of the family of Miltiades, who acquired the sovereignty in the following manner : The Dolonci having suffered much in a war against the Absynthians, sent some of their chief men to consult the oracle of Delphos about the event of it. The Pythian, instead of answering the question they proposed, ordered them to desire the first man, who, after their departure, should invite them to lodge in his house, to lead a colony into their country. With this answer the Dolonci departed, and passing through the territory of the Phocians, and Bæotians, without receiving any offer of entertainment, turned into the road of Athens. As they passed through Athens, Miltiades, the son of Cypselus, seeing them clothed and armed in a different manner from the A-

thenians, and knowing thereby that they were strangers, invited them to lodge in his house. They accepted the invitation, and, being hospitably entertained, acquainted him with the answer of the oracle, and exhorted him to comply with the admonition of the god. As Miltiades was grown weary of the government of Pisistratus, and wanted only some plausible pretence to withdraw from Athens, he immediately went to consult the Delphian oracle, whether he should yield to the request of the Dolonci or not ; and having received an encouraging answer, he took with him such of the Athenians as were willing to join in this expedition, and setting sail for the Chersonesus with the Dolonci, was, upon his arrival, invested with the sovereign power. The first thing he did after he was raised to the throne was, to build a wall upon the isthmus of the Chersonesus, from the city of Cardia to that of Paëtya, to prevent the Absynthians from infesting the country for the future with their incursions. Having completed this work, he, in the next place, made war on the *Lampsaceni*ans, and falling into an ambuscade, was taken by the enemy ; but Cræsus king of Lydia, who had a great esteem for him, being acquainted with his misfortune, dispatched a messenger to Lampsacus, with orders to demand the liberty of Miltiades ; and to let them know, that in case they refused to comply with his demand, he would use them like pines. The *Lampsaceni*ans, differing in their opinion about the meaning of that menace, were not a little perplexed at this message ; but one of their senators observing, that of all trees the pine alone perishes entirely when cut down, without leaving any shoots, they immediately set Miltiades at liberty, and sent him home without ransom. Having thus, by means of Cræsus, escaped slavery, he resumed the government ; but died soon after, leaving the kingdom, as he had no children of his own, to Stesagoras, the son of his brother Cimon. The Dolonci honoured his memory with sacrifices, celebrating annually on this occasion gymnastic and equestrian exercises, no *Lampsaceni*an being permitted to contend at them for the prize <sup>P</sup>. During the war, which still continued with the people of Lampsacus, Stesagoras likewise died without children, being mortally wounded with the blow of an ax, which he received on the head, from one who pretended to be a deserter. After his death the sons of Pisistratus sent Miltiades, the son of Cimon and brother of Stesagoras, to the Chersonesus with one ship, to take upon him the government of that peninsula. On his arrival he kept himself retired, under colour of honouring the memory of his brother Stefagoras ; which the Chersonians hearing, sent the chief men of each city to his house, to condole with him in the name of the whole nation. As he found that they had no inclination to bestow the crown upon him, he caused all those to be seized who were come to visit him, and by that means reduced, with the few troops he had, the cities thus destitute of their leading men. In the third year of his government he abandoned his dominions, not daring to wait the coming of the Scythian Nomades, who having been irritated by the expedition of Darius, had assembled their forces, and were advancing to the frontiers of the Chersonesus. Upon the departure of the Scythians, he was reinstated in the sovereignty by a strong party he had among the Dolonci. In the sixth year of his reign the Phœnicians, who attended Darius in his expedition into Greece, being arrived at Tenedos, with a design to invade the Chersonesus, he put all his riches on board five ships, and sailed for Athens. The Phœnicians, upon his retreat, made themselves masters of the Chersonesus ; and on this occasion it was, that the Byzantians and Chalcedonians, leaving their ancient habitations, fled to the coasts of the Euxine sea, and there built the city of Mesambria <sup>9</sup>. This is all we can gather from the ancients concerning the Dolonci.

Dentelæ

THE Dentelæ are mentioned by Tully <sup>1</sup>, Pliny <sup>2</sup>, Strabo <sup>3</sup>, who calls them Denthelitæ, and Livy <sup>4</sup>. All we know of them is, that they had at first a king of their own ; that they were afterwards reduced by the Macedonians ; that they assisted the Romans against Philip and Perseus kings of Macedon, and continued faithful to Rome, till being provoked by the oppressions and cruelties of Piso, they took up arms against him, and committed great devastations in the neighbouring countries subject to the Romans <sup>5</sup>. In the reign of Augustus they were still governed by their own princes ; for we find one Sitas mentioned by Dion Cassius <sup>6</sup>, as reigning over them, and making war upon the Bastarnæ, whom he entirely defeated with the troops sent to his assistance by Crassus, at that time prætor of Macedon.

Bessi

THE Bessi inhabited mount Hæmus, living there in huts, and maintaining themselves by plundering their neighbours. They were by far the most savage and inhuman of all the Thracians, as appears from St. Jerom <sup>7</sup>, Paulinus of

Nola <sup>a</sup>, Eutropius <sup>b</sup>, and Ovid <sup>c</sup>, who make particular mention of their cruelty. Their chief city, Uscudama, is now known by the name of Adrianople. They lived under their own kings; the neighbouring princes not thinking it worth their while to disturb them, till the consulate of M. Licinus Lucullus and C. Cassius Varus; that is, to the 681st year of Rome, when the consul Lucullus invaded their country, and, having gained a signal victory over them, took their metropolis, and subjected the whole nation to the Roman laws <sup>c</sup>. The Romans, notwithstanding they had reduced them by force of arms, still suffered them to live under their own kings; for Piso, while he governed Macedon in quality of proconsul, having treacherously seized Rabocentus, whom Suetonius calls prince of the Bessi, caused him to be publicly beheaded; which affront so exasperated the whole nation, that they shook off the Roman yoke; but were overthrown in a great battle by Octavius the father of Augustus <sup>d</sup>. During the civil wars of Rome, they attempted anew to recover their liberty; but were again conquered by the famous M. Brutus Junior <sup>e</sup>. In the reign of Augustus, one Vologæses, a native of the country, and priest of Bacchus, having under pretence of religion drawn to himself great crowds of people, made himself master of the whole country; and entering the Chersonesus, committed there most dreadful ravages; but was at last overcome by L. Piso, who obliged the savage inhabitants to lay down their arms, and submit to such conditions as he was pleased to impose upon them. From this time the Bessi continued subject to the Romans, without making any further attempts towards the recovery of their ancient liberty <sup>f</sup>.

THE Bistones inhabited that part of Thrace which lies between mount Rhodope to the north, the river Hebrus to the east, the Nessus to the west, and the Ægean sea to the south. Their metropolis Tinda is famous among the poets on account of the fabulous horses of Diomedes king of this country. The Bistones underwent the same fate as the other people of Thrace, having been first subdued by the Macedonians, and afterwards by the Romans.

THE Odomantes bordered on Macedon, being parted from that country by the river Strymon. Pliny confounds them with the Odrysæ<sup>b</sup>; but Thucydides speaks of them as a distinct people<sup>b</sup>. Suidas, upon the authority of Aristophanes, tells us, that they used circumcision. In the time of the Peloponnesian war they were governed by Polles, the only king of the Odomantes we find mentioned in history, who, in that war, sided with the Athenians, as we read in Thucydides<sup>c</sup>.

Ciones.

THE Ciones inhabited the country lying between the Hebrus and the Mælas, and are mentioned by Homer<sup>k</sup>, Virgil<sup>l</sup>, Ovid<sup>m</sup>, and Pliny<sup>n</sup>. The city of Ænos, famous on account of the tomb of Polydorus, was their capital. Homer speaks of three of their kings, viz. Pirous, Imbrasus, and Rhigmus. Pirous, if that poet is to be credited, espoused the cause of the Trojans, and was killed by Thoas the Ætolian<sup>o</sup>. Rhigmus, his son and successor, was killed in the same war by Achilles<sup>p</sup>.

Edoni.

THE Edoni or Edones possessed that country which lay between the Strymon and the famous city of Philippi, and are mentioned by Herodotus<sup>q</sup>, Thucydides<sup>r</sup>, Pliny<sup>s</sup>, &c. Thamyris, the celebrated musician, was a native of this country. He is said to have been the disciple of Linus, and contemporary with Hercules and Orpheus. He was so eminent for his skill in music, that he had the confidence to challenge the muses themselves, by whom he was overcome, and deprived both of his art and sight<sup>t</sup>. The Edoni were governed by kings, like the other Thracian nations. The following princes are mentioned by the ancients, viz. Dryas I. Lycurgus, Dryas II. and Pittacus. Dryas is mentioned by Apollodorus<sup>u</sup> and Ovid<sup>w</sup>; Lycurgus by Virgil<sup>x</sup>, Apollodorus<sup>y</sup>, Hyginus<sup>z</sup>, and Diodorus Siculus<sup>a</sup>, who tells us, that he made war with Bacchus. Dryas II. was killed, according to Apollodorus and Hyginus<sup>b</sup>, by his father Lycurgus. Pittacus lived in the time of the Peloponnesian war, and was murdered, as Thucydides informs us<sup>c</sup>, by the children of Goaxes, another petty prince of Thrace.

ALL we know of the Brygi is, that they were subdued by Brygi. Mardonius, and served under Xerxes when he invaded Greece<sup>d</sup>. Of the Thyni we shall have occasion to speak in the history of Thyni. the Bithynians. The Pieræ first inhabited part of Macedon, Pieræ. where they consecrated to the muses, from them called Pierides, the countries of Pieria, Libetrus, and Pimplia, as they did also Helicon in Bæotia, having sent some colonies into that country. Being driven out of Macedon by the Temenidæ, they settled under mount Pangæus near the banks of the Strymon. Those who had settled in Bæotia, were likewise driven from thence; and on this occasion it was that they settled in Phocis, and consecrated mount Parnassus to the muses<sup>e</sup>. The kings of the Pieræ, mentioned by the antients, are, Atlas, Tharpps, and Oeager. Linus and Orpheus, so much celebrated by the poets, were the sons of the latter<sup>f</sup>.

THE Odrysæ possessed great part of that country which Odrysæ. lies between the mountains of Hæmus and Rhodope, and were by far the most powerful people of all Thrace. When this kingdom began, is uncertain; Ovid<sup>g</sup> will have Eumolpus, who waged war with Erechtheus king of Athens, to have been the founder of the kingdom of the Odrysæ. However that be, it is certain that the Odrysæ made no figure till the reign of Teres, who was contemporary with Perdiccas II. Kings of king of Macedon. He was the son of Sitalces, the first king the Odrysæ. of the Odrysæ whom we find mentioned in history. Sitalces sæ. attended Xerxes in his expedition into Greece, and lost his Sitalces. life in that war, as we read in Æschylus<sup>h</sup>. He was succeeded by Teres, the first, according to Thucydides<sup>i</sup>, who raised Teres. the kingdom of the Odrysæ above the other petty states of Thrace; whence he is called by that writer the first king of the Odrysæ. He reduced great part of Thrace, and made himself formidable to the neighbouring princes; but was at last overthrown in a great battle by the Thyni. He died in the ninety-second year of his age, having spent most part of his life in waging war with the other kings of Thrace<sup>k</sup>; for Plutarch tells us, that he used to say there was no difference between a pacific king and a groom<sup>l</sup>.

HE was succeeded by his son Sitalces, who entered into an Sitalces alliance with the Athenians against the Lacedæmonians, and II. even delivered up to the former the ambassadors who had been sent to his court from Sparta, in order to persuade him to abandon his allies. He received into his kingdom, and entertained with great magnificence, Scylis king of the Scythians, who had been driven out of his kingdom, for attempting to introduce among his subjects the customs of the Greeks; but Oetamasas, the banished king's brother, who had been raised to the throne, threatening to invade Thrace with a very numerous army, unless Sitalces delivered up the fugitive prince into his hands, he chose rather to betray his guest, than engage in so dangerous a war. This prince afterwards made war upon the Pæonians, Macedonians, and Chalcedonians, in which he is said by Thucydides to have had one hundred and fifty thousand men under his command<sup>m</sup>. In all these expeditions he was attended with good success, which struck such terror into the other princes of Thrace, that most of them voluntarily submitted to him; insomuch, that, at his death, he was possessed of all those provinces, which extend from the city of Abdera, on the Ægean sea, to the mouth of the Ister, which discharges itself into the Euxine sea<sup>n</sup>. Sitalces dying without children, left the kingdom to Scuthes, the son of his brother Spardocus, who having married Stratonice, the daughter of Perdiccas II. king of Macedon, entered into an alliance with that prince, and being assisted by him, made several new acquisitions, extending the confines of his dominions even beyond mount Hæmus<sup>o</sup>. Amadocus and Mesades, the sons of Scuthes, succeeded each other in the kingdom; but performed nothing worth mentioning. Scuthes II. who succeeded his father Mesades, subdued the Thyni, joined the Lacedæmonians against the Persians, obtained a considerable victory over the Athenians, who had made a descent on the coasts of Thrace, &c. But as he was obliged to lay heavy taxes on his subjects to defray the expences of the many wars he was engaged in, the chief lords of his kingdom, entering into a conspiracy against him, drove him from the throne; however, he was afterwards restored by Iphierates, and left the kingdom to Cotys the son of Amadocus<sup>p</sup>. Cotys was a most voluptuous prince, but at the same time a man of courage and resolution. He maintained, during the whole time of his reign, a war with the Athenians, and was at last assassinated by Python and Heraclidas, both natives of Ænos, who, after the murder, flying to Athens, were kindly received by the Athenians, made free of their city, and presented with crowns of gold, for having thus delivered them from so troublesome an enemy <sup>1</sup>. Upon his death his son Cersobleptes took possession of the kingdom, which the Athenians obliged him to divide with his two brothers, Berisades and Amodocus. The Chersonesus he gave up to the Athenians, chusing rather to part with that peninsula, than engage in a war against so powerful an enemy. However, he could not avoid coming to a rupture with Philip the father of Alexander, by whom he was overcome, and stripped of great part of his dominions <sup>2</sup>. He died after a reign of eleven years, leaving the kingdom to his son Scuthes, who was then an hostage at the court of Philip king of Macedon, who immediately sent him home to take possession of the throne; but he was scarce well seated in it, when he fell upon the Macedonians, who inhabited the countries which had been taken from his father, drove them quite out, and recovered all the provinces which had formerly belonged to the kingdom of the Odryse. These he held under Alexander the Great, whom he assisted against the Persians; but, upon that prince's death, he marched against Lyfimachus at the head of twenty thousand foot and eight thousand horse, protesting, that he would not submit to the division which the captains of Alexander had made. He engaged Lyfimachus twice; in the first battle no considerable advantage was gained on either side; but in the second Scuthes was intirely routed, and his army cut in pieces <sup>3</sup>. He died soon after this overthrow, and was succeeded by his brother Ariopharnes, who having, on his accession to the throne espoused the cause of Eumelus against Satyrus king of Bosphorus, was by the latter overthrown, with the loss almost of the whole army <sup>4</sup>; which so grieved him, that he died soon after.

NEXT to him reigned Scuthes IV. who, as we read in Livy, was attacked in the heart of his dominions by Philip the father of Perfes, and by that prince reduced to great straits, having lost Philippopolis and several other strong-holds <sup>5</sup>. Scuthes was succeeded by Cotys II. who joined Perfes against the Romans, assisting him with a body of a thousand chosen horse; but Eumenes, king of Pergamus, having stirred up against him a neighbouring prince, named Atys, and sent a body of troops into his dominions, under the command of

Corrahus, one of his generals, Cotys was obliged to leave Perjes, and hasten to the defence of his own kingdom. As he had been ever faithful to Perjes, and almost the only ally on whom he could depend, the king of Macedon followed him in person, put the Pergamians and Thracians, who infested his territories, to flight, retook the cities he had lost, and restored tranquillity to his dominions. Perjes, on his parting with Cotys to return to Macedon, distributed two hundred talents among the Thracians, who had served under him the last campaign; but as this was only six months pay, whereas he had promised a whole year's, Cotys, taking it amiss that his men should be thus defrauded of what was their due, refused to assist him the ensuing year, and no sooner heard he was defeated and taken by the Romans, than he sent ambassadors to Rome to congratulate the senate on the success of their army, and excuse his joining Perjes. The ambassadors were received very kindly by the senate, and the Thracian hostages, that had been taken together with Perjes, restored to them without ransom w. Cotys was succeeded by Diegylis, who having led a body of Thracians to the assistance of Prusias his son-in-law, was defeated and taken prisoner by Attalus *; and this is all we know of him. Sothymus the son of Diegylis reigned at the time of the social war, or the war between Rome and her Italian allies. These domestic divisions he improved to his advantage, invading Greece, and laying waste Macedon, whence he returned with an immense booty; but was at last overcome, and obliged to abandon the countries he had possessed himself of, by C. Sentius, prætor of Macedon y. Cotys III. the son of Sothymus, succeeding his father, entered into an alliance with Rome, and prevailed upon Piso proconsul of Macedon, by a present of three hundred talents, to put to death Rabocentus king of the Bessi, and bestow part of his dominions on him. In the civil war of Rome he sent five hundred horse to the assistance of Pompey z. Cicero and Cæsar call him Cottus; but Lucan Cotys a. His son Safales, after his death, followed the same party, and had great share in the signal victory which was gained over L. Cassius Longinus. He distinguished himself in the battle of Pharsalia; but nevertheless was pardoned by Cæsar. He died not long before the battle of Philippi, and left his kingdom, as he had no children, to the people of Rome; but M. Brutus seized it after Cæsar's death <sup>b</sup>. Plutarch tells us, that he was still alive at the time of the battle of Actium, and served in that war under Antony <sup>c</sup>. That writer calls him Sadalus, as does also Cicero; but we have followed Cæsar, who gives him the name of Sasales. Tho' he had bequeathed his dominions to the Romans, yet M. Brutus bestowed them on his brother Cotys, who, dying soon after, left them to his son Rhymetal- Cotys IV. ces, who being, at his father's death, under age, was carefully Rhyme- educated, together with his brother Rhasciporis, by Rhyme- talces their uncle by the mother. Both brothers served under Tiberius in the Pannonic war, and had a great share in the victories he gained over those barbarians. Upon the death of Rhymetalces, Augustus divided his kingdom between Rhaf- Rhascipo- ciporis his brother and Cotys his son. In this partition the ris and cities and countries bordering upon Greece fell to Cotys, Cotys V. and the mountainous and barren provinces to Rhasciporis; who thereupon invading his nephew's dominions, seized the most fruitful parts of them for himself. Cotys, thus provoked, raised a powerful army; but, while the two princes were ready to take the field, Tiberius, who had succeeded Augustus in the empire, dispatched messengers to them, ordering them to lay down their arms, and refer the decision of their differences to the arbitration of the Roman people. Cotys forthwith dismissed his army, and, at the request of Rhasciporis, came to an interview with him, where he was treacherously seized, and loaded with chains, Rhasciporis pretending that he had formed a design of seizing him. When news of these proceedings were brought to Rome, Tiberius dispatched messengers to Rhasciporis enjoining him to send Cotys to Rome, and to appear himself in person before the senate, to give an account of the whole matter; since neither he nor the senate could pronounce sentence without hearing the cause. Hereupon Rhasciporis caused Cotys to be murdered, giving out that he had laid violent hands on himself. This Tiberius feigned to believe; but, however, inhibited upon the king's coming to Rome; which he refusing to do, Tiberius preferred to the government of Mæsia, which bordered on the country of the Odrysæ, Pomponius Flaccus, an intimate friend of the king's, who, having treacherously drawn him into the Roman territories, caused him to be seized, and sent to Rome, where he was accused by the wife of Cotys, and being convicted of the crimes laid to his charge, condemned to exile, and sent to Alexandria. He was soon after put to death by an order from Tiberius, for attempting to fly from the place of his banishment <sup>d</sup>. This prince is called by Dion Cassius Rhascipolis; by Tacitus Rhescuporis; by Velleius Rhascupolis. Upon the banishment of Rhasciporis the kingdom was divided between Rhometalces his son, who had opposed all his father's measures, and the sons of Cotys. As these were minors, Trebellienus Rufus was appointed their guardian, and charged with the administration. The sons of Cotys having some how or other dissatisfied the emperor Caligula, were by him driven out of their kingdom, which was conferred upon Rhometalces, who by this means became the sole master of all the countries that had ever belonged to the Odryse <sup>e</sup>. From this time we find no mention made of the Odryse till the reign of Vespasian, who, as we read in Suetonius <sup>f</sup>, reduced their country to a Roman province.

The Auto-
nomi.

THE Autonomi, so called because every man among them was a law to himself, inhabited the most rocky and barren places of Thrace, being separated from Mæsia by mount Hæmus <sup>g</sup>. Herodotus calls them sometimes Autonomi, and sometimes Satracæ <sup>h</sup>. They were according to that writer, the most gallant and warlike people of all Thrace. They were, not afraid even to engage Alexander, and on that occasion behaved with extraordinary valour; but their army was cut in pieces, their baggage taken, and their wives and children made prisoners. After this overthrow they submitted to the conqueror, who, to prevent them from revolting in his absence, took along with him into Asia all the chief men of their nation <sup>i</sup>. They served under Perfes against the Romans; but, however, were allowed to live according to their own laws till the reign of Vespasian, who made their country part of the province of Thrace.

Crobyzi.

The Crobyzi possessed that part of Thrace which lay between mount Hæmus and the Euxine sea. They are mentioned by Herodotus <sup>k</sup> and Athenæus, the last writer telling us, that they had kings of their own, and amongst others one Isanthus, who was one of the most wealthy and comely princes of his age <sup>l</sup>.

THE Mædi inhabited that part of Thrace which bordered Mædi. upon Macedon, and are mentioned by most of the antients, namely, by Thucydides <sup>m</sup>, Plutarch <sup>n</sup>, Vegetius <sup>o</sup>, Pliny <sup>p</sup>, Livy <sup>q</sup>, Stephanus, &c. who all tell us, that they were a brave and gallant nation, strangers to all manner of effeminacy, and inured to the fatigues of war. Their warlike temper gave occasion to poets to feign, as Vegetius observes <sup>r</sup>, that Mars the god of war was born in their country. However, they were reduced by Philip the son of Amyntas; but having shaken off the yoke while he was employed against the Byzantii, they were anew subdued by his son Alexander, who possessed himself of their metropolis, called formerly Jampharina; but from him Alexandropolis <sup>s</sup>. But notwithstanding the great loss they sustained on this occasion, Alexander no sooner left Macedon, than they invaded that country anew, and penetrated as far as Greece, committing every-where most dreadful ravages; and thus they continued to harass the Macedonians, till that kingdom became a Roman province, when they were at last after a long war, intirely reduced by the Romans, in the consulate of Gn. Octavius and C. Scribonius, in the year of Rome 675. They had some years before plundered the rich temple of Delphos, and with part of the booty bribed L. Scipio, who had been sent against them, to let them depart unmolested, and even to conclude an alliance with them <sup>t</sup>. To this sacrilegious connivance of the Roman general, Appian ascribes the civil wars, and the many calamities which not long after fell upon Rome <sup>u</sup>.

THE country of the Sapæi lay between the rivers Melas Sapæi. and Arzus, bordering on the gulf of Melas, on the Chersonesus, and the Propontis. The Sapæi were governed by their own kings. Those, whose names have reached us, are Olorus, Timotheus, Rhascipolis, Rhascus, and Cotys. Olorus gave his daughter Hegeipole in marriage to Miltiades, the second of this name. From this Olorus was descended the father of Thucydides, the historian, called also Olorus, as Plutarch informs us <sup>w</sup>; but at what time, or on what occasion, he settled at Athens, is uncertain. Thucydides had great possessions and rich mines in Thrace <sup>x</sup>; and although they might have come to him by his wife, who was a native of Sapte-Hyle, as some have affirmed, yet it is manifest from Plutarch<sup>y</sup>, Cicero<sup>z</sup>, and Ammianus Marcellinus<sup>a</sup>, that the great men of that country looked upon him as nearly related to them before his marriage. Timotheus is mentioned by Ammianus Marcellinus as reigning in this part of Thrace; but neither he nor other writers give us any account of his actions. Rhascipolis and Rhascus reigned many years, or rather ages, after Olorus; that is, in the time of the civil wars between Cæsar and Pompey; but as to the actions, and even the names, of the intermediate kings, we are quite in the dark, the works of Callisthenes and Socrates, who wrote a particular and distinct account of the affairs of Thrace, as Plutarch informs us<sup>b</sup>, having been long since lost. Rhascipolis and Rhascus, in the civil wars, sided with Pompey, and afterwards with Brutus; but being pardoned by Octavianus, assisted Antony with three thousand horse, till he fell out with Octavianus, when they both declared for the latter. Cotys was the son of one of these two brothers, succeeded them in the kingdom, and enjoyed it till the latter end of the reign of Tiberius, when he was treacherously murdered by his own subjects, and his kingdom reduced to the form of a province<sup>c</sup>.

Celetæ. THE Celetæ inhabited part of mount Hæmus, and part of mount Rhodope, and are called by Pliny<sup>d</sup> the most savage of all the Thracians. Livy tells us, that they fell upon Cn. Manlius, as he was returning out of Asia into Europe, and took from him great part of the booty which he had got by plundering some rich cities of Gallo-Græcia<sup>e</sup>. And this is all we find recorded of them in history.

<sup>i</sup> Kings of the Thracian Chersonesus. THE Thracian Chersonesus had likewise its own kings, among whom mention is made of Polymnestor, Euforus, and Acamas. Polymnestor married Ilione the daughter of king Priam, and, after the destruction of Troy, treacherously murdered Polydorus, who had been sent by his father Priam to be brought up at his court, as in a place of safety<sup>f</sup>. Hyginus tells us, that Polydorus, being sent very young into Thrace, Ilione his sister brought him up as the son of Polymnestor; and that not Polydorus, but his own son Deiphilus, was murdered by the cruel Polymnestor. Euforus and Aca-

His daughter Acete married Æneas a Theffalian, by whom she had Cyzicus, who built the famous city bearing his name <sup>h</sup>. Before we dismiss this subject, we cannot help observing, that the Greeks were chiefly indebted to the Thracians for the polite arts that flourished among them ; for Orpheus, Linus, Musæus, Thamyris, and Eumolpus, all Thracians, were the first, as Eustathius informs us <sup>i</sup>, who charmed the inhabitants of Greece with their eloquence and melody, and persuaded them to exchange their fierceness for a sociable life and peaceful manners ; nay, great part of Greece was antiently peopled by Thracians. Tereus a Thracian governed at Daulis in Phocis, where the tragical story of Philomela and Progne was acted. From thence a body of Thracians passed over to Eubæa, and possessed themselves of that island. Of the same nation were the Aones, Tembices, and Hyanthians, who made themselves masters of Bœotia ; and great part of Attica itself was inhabited by Thracians, under the command of the celebrated Eumolpus <sup>k</sup>. It is not therefore without the utmost ingratitude and injustice, that the Greeks style them Barbarians, since to them chiefly they were indebted both for the peopling and polishing of their country.

E P I R U S.Name, situation,
&c.

E P I R U S, the antient kingdom of the Æacidæ, was at first called Epirus Dodonæa, that is, the continent of the Dodonæans, or the continent inhabited by the Dodonæans, and afterwards Epirus, or the continent, without any addition, that being the import of the Greek word Epeiros. It was bounded on the north by the Ceraunian mountains; on the south by the Ambracian gulf; on the east by Thessaly and Macedon; and on the west by the Ionian sea<sup>1</sup>. It was antiently divided into three districts or provinces, namely, Chaonia, Thesprotia, and Molossis, to which some authors add Cassopia or Cassiope, Cestrine, and Pindus. Chaonia, the most northern part of Epirus, was so called from its antient inhabitants the Chaones, who were descended, according to the scholiast of Aristophanes, from the Thracians; according to Aristotle, from the Oenotrii, one of the most antient nations of Italy. Cities of note in this part of Epirus, were, according to Ptolemy, Oricum or Oricus, situated on the coast of the Ionian sea, at the foot of the Ceraunian mountains. It was founded, according to Pliny<sup>m</sup>, by a colony from Colchis, had a famous harbour, and was in the Roman times a place of great note, but of no strength, as we read in Livy and Cæsar<sup>n</sup>. Cassiope, or Cassope, famous on account of the temple of Jupiter Cassius; whence some are of opinion that it borrowed its name. Torrentius and most of the modern writers confound Cassiope in Epirus with another city in the island of Corcyra bearing an-

tiently the same name <sup>o</sup>. This city was the metropolis of the province Cassopia or Cassiope, which contained, according to Strabo <sup>p</sup> and Pliny <sup>q</sup>, three other small towns, viz. Buchætium, Elatia, and Pandosia. The inland towns of Ghaonia were, Antigonia, founded by Antigonus, Phænice, Hecatompedum, Omphalum, Elæus, and the strong town, or, as Pliny calls it <sup>r</sup>, castle of Chimera, much frequented on account of its hot baths. The most remarkable cities in Thesprotia, which lay between the Ambracian lake and the sea, were, Buthrotum, Ephyra, Nicopolis built by Augustus after the Ætiac victory, and called by Pliny <sup>r</sup> a free city and a Roman colony, Mæandria, Cæstria, Charadra, and Ambracia. The latter city, which was one of the most considerable of Epirus, stood not far from the mouth of the river Arachtus, near the gulf to which it gave its name. It was in the Roman times a place of great strength, as we have observed in the history of Greece, full of people, and about three miles in compass. In antient times it was a free city; but afterwards reduced by the Æacidæ kings of Epirus, who chose it for the place of their residence <sup>s</sup>. In process of time the Ætolians made themselves masters of it, and held it till they were subdued by the Romans <sup>u</sup>. Molossis was an inland province, and, according to Scylax, only forty stades or furlongs in compass <sup>w</sup>. It was called Molossis from Molossus the son of Pyrrhus and Andromache, and contained the following cities, Dodona, Passaron, Tecmon, Phylace, and Horreum. Dodona is placed by some writers in Thesprotia <sup>x</sup>, and by others in Molossis <sup>y</sup>; but Strabo <sup>z</sup> reconciles these two opposite opinions, by telling us, that antiently it belonged to Thesprotia, and afterwards to Molossis; for it stood on the confines of these two provinces. This city was once famous for the temple and oracle of Jupiter Dodonæus, much spoke of by all the antient writers (K). The other cities of Molossis contained

(K) The city of Dodona is said to have been built by Deucalion, who, in that universal deluge, retreated to this place, which, by reason of its height, secured him from the waters. Hither resorted to him all those who had escaped from the inundation. With these

contained nothing worthy of observation. The kingdom of Epirus must have comprehended in the Roman times a great many

he peopled his new-built city, calling it Dodona, according to some, from a sea nymph of that name, according to others, from Dodon the son, or Dodone the daughter, of Jupiter and Europa. At the same time Deucalion is said to have founded a temple, which he consecrated to Jupiter, who is from thence styled Dadonæus. This was the first temple of Greece; for the Epirots were antiently reckoned among the Greeks. But the oracle seems to have been a considerable time before it; for Herodotus (83) tells us, that it was the most antient of all the oracles of Greece, which could not be true, if it had not been before Deucalion's time; for he, having escaped the deluge, advised with the oracle of Themis on mount Parnassus, about the means he should use to re-people the country; and the same oracle is said to have belonged to the earth and Neptune before it was possessed by Themis. Herodotus (84) gives us two accounts of the origin of this oracle: in the first, which he received from the priests of Jupiter at Thebes in Egypt, he tells us, that the Phœnicians having carried away two priestesses from that place, and sold one of them in Libya and the other in Greece, each of them established the first oracles in those nations, the one of Jupiter Hammon, the other of Jupiter Dadonæus. The other account was given him by the priestesses at Dodona, and confirmed by all those who ministred in the temple, viz. That two black pigeons taking their flight from Thebes in Egypt, one of them arrived in Libya, where she commanded an oracle to be erected to Jupiter Hammon. The other came to Dodona, where she perched on an oak, and admonished the inhabitants with an articulate voice to found an oracle in that place in honour of the same Jupiter. Afterwards Herodotus delivers his own opinion relating to this subject, viz. that if the Phœnicians did really carry away two women from Thebes, and sell one of them in Libya and the other in Greece, the latter was in all likelihood bought by the Thesprotians, who inhabited that country, which, in his time, was called Hellas; but formerly named Pelasgia, where, during her servitude, she consecrated an altar to Jupiter under an oak, nothing being more natural than to suppose that she, who had been a priestess of that god in Thebes, would not be unmindful of his worship in another place. To confirm this conjecture he adds, that these two oracles had a near resemblance to each other; and moreover tells us, that, in his opinion, the two pigeons, or rather women, were said to be black, because they came from Egypt, and called pigeons, because they were barbarians or foreigners, and their speech no more understood than the chattering of birds; but as soon as they learned the Greek tongue, they were said to speak with a human voice. Eusebius gives two reasons more for this appellation (85), viz. that they were called ΠΕΛΕΙΑΣ or doves, because they made their predictions by the observation of those birds; as those who made use of crows in divination were named ΚΟΡΑΚΟΡΜΑΝΤΕΙΣ; and secondly, because, in the Molossian language, old women were styled ΠΕΛΕΙΑΪ, and old men ΠΕΛΕΙΟΙ; and that those prophetesses being old women, either by a mistake of the word, or a poetical equivocation were called doves. Why old persons should be thus termed, the old scholiast upon Sophocles informs us (86); for the old prophetesses, says he, were called ΠΕΛΕΙΑΪ, because of their gray hairs. Servius gives another reason for this appellation (87), viz. that, in the Theffalian tongue, the word ΠΕΛΕΙΑΪ signified both a dove and a prophetess. Others tell us, that, in the hieroglyphical way of writing, by a black pigeon was signified a widow, who remained unmarried till death. Some writers say, that this oracle was founded by the Pelasgians, who were the most antient of all the nations that inhabited Greece. Of this opinion is Strabo (88), being led hereunto by Homer, who bestows upon the same Jupiter the names of Dodonæus and Pelasgicus (89). The same Strabo relates another fabulous opinion concerning the origin of this oracle out of Su'das's Theffalica. That writer, says Strabo (90), to gratify the Theffalians with a new-invented fable, relates, that the oracle of Dodona was translated out of Pelafgia, a country of Theffaly, into Epirus, being accompanied by a great number of women, from whom the prophetesses in after-ages were descended; and that from them Jupiter received the appellation of Pelasgicus. The persons who delivered the oracles were at first men, as Strabo and Eustathius observe out of Homer, who calls them in the masculine gender Προφήτας and Σέλλας (91). The same Strabo tells us (92) in his description of Bæotia, that, in after-ages, all those who consulted the oracle received answers from women, except the Bæotians, who had theirs from men; and of this custom he gives the following reason: In a war between the Bæotians and Pelasgians, the former consulting the oracle of Dodona about the event of the war, received for answer, that their enterprise should be crowned with success, if they acted wickedly. Hereupon the Bæotians, suspecting that the prophetess spoke in favour of the Pelasgians, seized her, and threw her into the fire. Those who ministered in the temple, immediately apprehended the Bæotians; but not thinking it lawful to put them to death in so sacred a place, before they were tried, and juridically condemned, advised them to refer the matter to the two surviving prophetesses. On the other hand, the Bæotians alledging, that no laws in the world allowed women to sit upon life and death, it was agreed, that two men should judge them jointly with the two prophetesses. When the judges came to pronounce sentence, the Bæotians were found guilty by the women, and cleared by the men; whereupon they were dismissed without any punishment, as was usual when the number of voices was equal on both sides; but on that occasion it was established, that men only should give answers to the Bæotians. The prophets of this temple were commonly called Tomuri, and the prophetesses Tomuræ, from Tomurus a mountain in Thesprotia, at the foot of which stood the temple. In process of time this word came to be a general name for any prophet; for thus Hesychius expounds it, and in this sense Lycophron applies it to Prylis the son of Mercury (93).

Near the temple was a sacred grove of oaks and beeches, which was supposed to be inhabited by the Dryades, Fauni, and Satyri, who, we are told, were often seen dancing under the shades of the trees. Before sowing was invented, when men lived upon acorns, those of this wood were in great request, as appears from the following verses of Virgil:

Chaoniam pingui glandem mutavit arista (94).

And again in the same book;

Prima Ceres ferro mortales vertere terram

These oaks or beeches were said to be endued with a human voice and prophetic spirit; for which reason they are called speaking and prophesying oaks. Argo, the ship of the Argonauts, which was built with the timber of this wood, is feigned to have been endued with the same power of speech, whence Lycophron calls it λαλεθρὴν κισσῶν, a chattering magpye (96). What gave occasion to this fiction was, as some writers tell us, that the prophets, when they gave answers, placed themselves in one of these trees, so that the oracle was thought to be uttered by the oak, which was only ject to the Epirots. Strabo counts the Athamanes, Æthices, Tymphæi, Orestæ, Paroræi, Atintanes, and Perrhæbi among the Epirotic nations; but Pliny <sup>d</sup> and Livy <sup>e</sup> reckon the Athamanes, Tymphæi, and Perrhæbi among the Ætolians. In Chaonia were the Ceraunian or Acroceraunian mountains, now monti della Chimera, parting the Ionian and Adriatic seas, and so called from their being frequently struck with lightning. In Thesprotia were the Acherusian lake and the river Acheron, much spoke of by the poets. It had its springs, according to Pliny <sup>f</sup>, in the abovementioned lake, and emptied itself into the Ambracian gulf; but according to Ptolemy, Strabo, and Thucydides <sup>g</sup>, it rose in the country of the Molossi, and, passing through the Acherusian lake, discharged itself into the Thesprotian bay. The rivers Aphas and Aracthus are mentioned by Livy <sup>h</sup> as rising in the same country. The celebrated mount Pindus parted Epirus and Thessaly, and was therefore by some geographers placed in Thessaly, by others in Epirus. The inland parts of Epirus were very barren and full of forests, but the coast pretty fruitful. The horses of this country were in great request among the antients, as were also the mastiffs of Molossis, from thence called by the Latins Molossæ <sup>i</sup>. The Epirots were deemed a very warlike pronounced out of its hollow stock, or from amongst its hollow branches. Some are of opinion, that the oracles were delivered from the branches of the tree, because the prophetic pigeons are reported by Herodotus to have perched upon a tree (97); and the scholiast upon Sophocles tells us, that above the oracle there were two pigeons (98). Others are inclined to believe, that the oracles were uttered from the hollow stock, because the prophets could best be concealed there (99). The brazen kettles of this place were no less famous than the speaking oaks. Some writers affirm, and others deny, that they were made use of in delivering the oracles; however that be, Demon in Suidas says, that they were so artificially placed about the temple, that, by striking one of them, the sound was communicated to all the rest. These kettles were consecrated by the Corcyraeans to Jupiter Dodonæus, as Strabo informs us (100). About what time, or on what account, this oracle ceased, is uncertain; but the above mentioned writer, who flourished under Augustus, tells us, that, in his time, the gods had deserted that and most other oracles (101).

people, and generally behaved, as we shall see in the history of their kings, with great gallantry; but continued in their former savage condition long after their neighbours were civilized; whence the islanders used to threaten their offenders, as we read in Athenæus <sup>k</sup>, with transportation to the continent, namely to Epirus.

Inhabitants.

THIS country was first peopled by Dodanim the son of Javan, and grandson of Japhet, or at least by some of his posterity, as Josephus informs us, <sup>l</sup>. Eusebius says, that Dodanim first settled in the island of Rhodes, and that some of his descendants being streightened there for want of room, passed over to the continent, and fixed their abode in Epirus, where they built a city, calling it Dodona from their progenitor Dodanim <sup>m</sup>. If the opinion of Eusebius be true, the Dodonæans were originally Greeks, and not Barbarians, as most of the antients stile them. However, in process of time several barbarous nations settled among them; and hence they are said by Strabo <sup>n</sup> to have spoke promiscuously the languages of the Greeks and Barbarians. The various nations we find mentioned by the most antient writers, as inhabiting Epirus before they became one people, and were blended under the common name of Epirots, are, the Selli, Chaones, Molossi, Dolopes, Paravæi, Orestæ, Dryopes, Hellopes, Ænians, and Pelasgi; but as to the origin of these different tribes, there is a great disagreement among authors, whose various opinions it would be too tedious to relate. We shall only observe, that the Selli were by prophane authors thought to have been the first inhabitants of Epirus, and to have ministred in the temple of Dodona. Homer speaks of them as priests, living round the abode of the Pelasgian Jove king of Dodona, that is, round the temple of Jupiter Dodonæus, and insinuates, that they lay on the ground, and never washed their feet <sup>o</sup>; whence Strabo concludes, that they were not originally Greeks, but sprung from some savage and unpolished nation <sup>p</sup>.

THE form of government, which prevailed in Epirus, was without all doubt monarchical, the whole country being divided into many small kingdoms quite independent of each other. Strabo indeed tells us, that first the Chaones, and after them the Molossi, were masters of all Epirus; but this if true, must have been in the most early ages; for we find several kings mentioned by Homer and other antient writers, as reigning at the time of the Trojan war, viz. Aidoneus,

Orcus, Phidon, Echetus, and Harpalicus. The other Epirotic nations continued for a long time to be governed by princes of their own blood ; but the Molossi fell very early under the power of Pyrrhus, a foreign prince, whose descendants were from him stiled Pyrrhidæ, and from his family Æacidæ, they being the progeny of Æacus <sup>1</sup>. Some of these petty kingdoms in process of time exchanged the monarchical for a republican form of government ; for Thucydides <sup>2</sup> tells us, that in his time the Thesprotæ and Chaones were governed, not by kings, but by annual magistrates. But when, and on what occasion, this change happened, is what we find nowhere recorded. At the beginning of the Peloponnesian war the Paravæi and Orestæ were still ruled by kings of their own nation ; the former by Antiochus, and the latter by Oroedus. But the kingdom of the Molossi soon eclipsed all the others, the Molossian princes having subjected the whole country, and united the many small kingdoms, of which it consisted, into one, known to the ancients by the name of Epirus. And this alone affords us matter for a history, there being nothing upon record relating to the others, but the names of some of their kings, and a few fabulous accounts of their actions ; for which we refer our readers to Hyginus <sup>3</sup> and Cyrillus <sup>4</sup>, it being beneath the dignity of history to take notice of them.

WE shall begin the history of the kings of Epirus with Pyrrhus. Pyrrhus, the first of the Æacidæ who reigned in that country, the times which preceded his reign being overcast with an impenetrable mist, and the kings, who are supposed to have ruled over the Molossi before his arrival, more spoke of by the poets than the historians. Pyrrhus was the son of Achilles, by Deidamia the daughter of Lycomedes, king of the island of Scyros. Upon the death of his father, who was killed at the siege of Troy, he was prevailed upon by Diomedes and Ulysses to leave his grand-father's court, where he had been brought up, and take upon him the command of the troops, which his father had led against Troy. He distinguished himself at the siege of that city, if the poets are to be credited, by his brave and gallant behaviour ; and after it was taken killed old king Priam with his own hand, threw Astyanax, the son of Hector and Andromache, headlong from a high tower, sacrificed Polyxena, the daughter of king Priam, on the tomb of his father, and carried Andromache with him into Epirus, where he settled, by the advice of the famous soothsayer Helenus, one of Priam's sons, with the

Myrmidones, who had served, during the Trojan war, both under his father and himself. He maintained himself in this new settlement with the assistance of the Pelopidæ, to whom he was nearly related, against the natives, who, finding they could not drive him out, submitted at length, and acknowledged him for their king. But his reign was not long; for he had scarce settled the affairs of his new kingdom, when he was murdered by Orestes in the very temple of Delphos, for marrying Hermione, the daughter of Menelaus, who had been betrothed to the said Orestes. Some writers tell us, that, under pretence of consulting the oracle of Delphos about his issue by Hermione, he attempted to plunder the temple, and was in that attempt killed by the priests<sup>u</sup>. His death gave rise to the proverb Neoptolemic revenge, used by the ancients, when one suffered the same evils which he had brought upon others; for Pyrrhus, surnamed Neoptolemus, had barbarously murdered king Priam at the altar of Jupiter Hercæus, and was himself murdered at the altar of Apollo Delphicus. The surname of Neoptolemus, or the young warrior, was given him, when he first went to the siege of Troy, he being then very young. His body, by command of the oracle, was buried in the temple where he had been murdered; but no honours were there paid to him till the irruption of the Gauls, which happened many ages after, when he is said to have appeared among other dead heroes, and to have with his ghastly looks struck great terror into those sacrilegious Barbarians. From that time he was honoured with yearly sacrifices, and solemn sports exhibited at his tomb<sup>w</sup>. The Pyrrhica, a kind of tournament or dance in armour, was so called from him, he having first used it round the tomb of his father Achilles<sup>x</sup>. Pyrrhus had two wives, Lanassa the daughter of Cleodæus, one of the descendants of Hercules, and Hermione the daughter of Menelaus and Helena. By the latter he had no children; but the former brought him three sons, Pyrrhus, Aleuas, and Ethnestus, and five daughters. By Andromache, whom some count among his lawful wives, others among his concubines, he had likewise three sons, Molossus, Pielus, and Amphialus. Pyrrhus, his eldest son by Lanassa, died in his infancy. Aleuas was brought up by Peleus his great-grand-father, king of Phthia in Thessaly, and by him appointed his heir and successor in that kingdom<sup>y</sup>. Ethnestus lived in Thessaly with his brother, and gave his name to the tribe of the Ethnestæ mentioned by Stephanus<sup>2</sup>. Molossus lived after the death of Molossus. his father under the tuition of Helenus, the son of king Priam, on whom Pyrrhus had bestowed Andromache in marriage, and with her part of his kingdom, having always shewn a great kindness and particular friendship for that prophet<sup>2</sup>. Helenus brought him up with all possible care, and, at his death, left him that part of the kingdom which had been given him by Pyrrhus. As Molossus died without children, he bequeathed the whole kingdom to his brother Pielus; for Pielus. he had succeeded his father Pyrrhus as well as Helenus. Some authors write, that Molossus was succeeded by his son, and that from him were descended the Æacidæ or Pyrrhidæ of Epirus; but we have followed Pausanias, who tells us in express terms, that Molossus died without children, was succeeded by his brother Pielus, and that from him the kings of Epirus were by the most antientwriters sometimes stiled Pielidæ<sup>b</sup>. Amphialus, the third son of Pyrrhus by Andromache, surnamed Pergamus, passed over into Asia with his mother, and having there killed in single combat Arias king of Teuthrania, reigned in his stead, fixing the place of his residence at Pergamus, whence he was stiled Amphialus Pergamus<sup>c</sup>. Pausanias will have the city of Pergamus to have been so called from him, but is herein contradicted by most of the antients, who tell us, that this city was built long before his time by the Myrians. Among the descendants of Amphialus we find one Praces mentioned by Pausanias<sup>d</sup>, who is said to have founded a temple in honour of Achilles in Laconica, whither the young men resorted to offer sacrifices to that hero, before they entered the lists in the public combats. The five daughters, which Pyrrhus had by Lanassa, as we have observed above, were married, according to Justin<sup>e</sup>, to the neighbouring princes.

THE descendants of Aleuas reigned in Thessaly, and are said by Herodotus<sup>f</sup> to have invited thither Xerxes king of Persia, and betrayed the country to him. When Alexander the Phœæan attempted to make himself master of all Thessaly, they had recourse to Alexander king of Macedon, who assisted them with a powerful army, as we have related in the history of Macedon<sup>g</sup>. They were at last stript of all their dominions, and the cities they possessed declared free, by Phi- hip the brother of Alexander, king of Macedon, as we read in Ulpianus<sup>h</sup>, Diodorus Siculus<sup>i</sup>, and Polyænus<sup>k</sup>. As to the immediate descendants of Pielus, we are quite in the dark both as to their exploits and succession, there being scarce any mention made of them by the antients till the time of the Persian war, when Admetus reigned in Epirus, and was master of the greatest part of that country. Antonius Liberalis indeed names the following intermediate princes, viz. Drius, Munichus, Aphidas, Genous, and Alcon; but upon what authority we know not. Admetus reigned, as we have hinted above, in Epirus, when Xerxes invaded Greece, and refused to join either party. Upon the defeat of the Persians, he courted the friendship of the Athenians, offering to enter into an alliance with the republic; but his proposals were, at the instigation of Themistocles, rejected with scorn, because he had not lent them any assistance against their common enemy. Notwithstanding the ill offices done him on this occasion by Themistocles, he afterwards received him, when banished from his own country, with great marks of friendship and esteem, refused to deliver him up to the Athenians and Lacedæmonians, though threatened with war, and plentifully supplied him with money and other necessaries on his leaving Epirus to pass over into Asia<sup>l</sup>.

Tharymbas.

He was succeeded by Tharymbas, the only child he had by his wife Phthia; but as this prince was very young at his father's death, he was, by a decree of the people, put under the tuition of Sabylinthus, a man of great distinction in his country, and of an unblemished character. Sabylinthus attended him to Athens, where he applied himself with great earnestness to the study of polite literature; for he was reckoned one of the most learned princes of his age, and is said to have been the first who introduced and encouraged learning among the Epirots his subjects. He likewise made many wise and wholesome laws, and is on that account reckoned by Plutarch amongst the antient lawgivers. He is mentioned by Plutarch, Thucydides, Pausanias, and Justin, under the following names, Tharrytas, Tharyps, Tharypus, Arymbas, and Tharymbas. The Chaones, who had been formerly subject to the Molossian kings, were in the reign of this prince, as we read in Thucydides<sup>m</sup>, subject to no king, but governed by their own laws and magistrates; the Molossians and the Anti- tanians alone acknowledged Tharymbas for their king, the several other nations of Epirus having either their peculiar kings, or being free from all subjection, as is evident from the abovementioned writer<sup>n</sup>.

Alcetas is the next king of Epirus we find mentioned in history : he was driven from the throne by his own subjects ; on which occasion he fled to Dionysius tyrant of Syracuse, by whom he was assisted with a body of Illyrians, who replaced him on the throne, after having overthrown his rebellious subjects in a pitched battle. His dominions were soon after invaded by Jason of Pheræa ; but having, by means of Timotheus, prevailed upon the Athenians to enter into an alliance with him, Jason thinking it adviseable not to provoke so powerful a republic, withdrew his forces from Epirus, and suffered Alcetas to spend the remainder of his reign in peace<sup>o</sup>.

Alcetas was succeeded by his son Neoptolemus, who, finding that his brother Arybas began to raise disturbances, and, dreading the consequences of a civil war, took him of his own accord for his partner in the kingdom. Upon the death of Neoptolemus, for we are intirely in the dark as to the particulars of his reign, Arybas remained sole master of the kingdom, which, contrary to the expectation of his subjects, he governed with great prudence, equity, and moderation. He was an encourager of learning, and shewed great favour to such as excelled in any branch of polite literature. To him Xenocrates, the Chalcedonian philosopher, dedicated, as Laertius informs us<sup>p</sup>, four books, which he wrote on the art of reigning. He brought up with great care his brother's children, viz. Alexander, Neoptolemus, Arybas, Troas, Olympias, and Cadmia, and married his niece Olympias to Philip king of Macedon, who had by her Alexander the Great. At his death, which happened after a reign of ten years, his nephew Alexander, whom Gellius calls Molossus, was raised to the sole possession of the throne by the favour of Philip his brother-in-law, who gave him in marriage Cleopatra his daughter by Olympias ; so that Alexander was both brother and son-in-law to Philip. This marriage was solemnized with the utmost pomp and magnificence at Ægæ, but proved fatal to Philip, who, on this occasion, was murdered by Pausanias, as we have related at length in the history of Macedon<sup>q</sup>, though Alexander, in his letter to Darius, says, that his father was murdered by assassins hired by him for that purpose, as we read in Curtius<sup>r</sup> and Arrian<sup>l</sup>.

NOT long after the accession of Alexander to the crown of Epirus, Archydemas king of Lacedæmon being killed in fighting for the Tarentini against the Lucani and Brutii, the former invited Alexander into Italy to their assistance. The king of Epirus, promising himself nothing less than the subduing of the west with as much rapidity, as Alexander the Great his nephew and brother-in-law had begun to conquer the east, readily closed with the proposal, and having made a descent at Pæstum, a maritime city near the mouth of the river Sibarus, reduced several cities of the Lucani and Brutii, and became formidable to all the eastern parts of Italy. The Romans being at that time employed in suppressing the revolt of the Latins, and not caring to engage in a war with two so powerful enemies at once, entered into an alliance with the Epirot, as did also the Metapontini and Pediculi, after he had gained a signal victory over the united forces of the Brutii and Lucani. The success which attended his arms in the two first campaigns, made him believe that he should reap as great an harvest of glory in Sicily, Italy, and Africa, as his nephew was reaping in Persia and the rest of Asia; but the unhappy prince lost his life, where he hoped to have enlarged his conquests. This memorable event is thus related, and no doubt blended with many fables, by the Greek and Latin historians<sup>t</sup>. Before Alexander left Epirus, say they, he consulted the celebrated oracle of Dodona, about the success that was to attend him during the remaining part of his life. The god returned him this answer; viz. that the waters of Acheron would prove fatal to him; and at the same time admonished him to avoid the city of Pandosia, lest he should there finish his days. Acheron was a river of Epirus, and Pandosia a city of the same country: Alexander therefore, not knowing that in the country of the Brutii there was a river and a city bearing the same names, willingly complied with the invitation of the Tarentini, and left his own country, fearing it might prove fatal to him, to make war in that of the Brutii. As he was fully persuaded that his life could be in no danger there, he exposed his person to the greatest dangers, took several cities, namely Heraclea,

Cosentia,

Cosentia, Sipontum, Terina, &c. and sent above three hundred hostages to Epirus, all chosen out of the best families of the places he had conquered. Having overcome the Brutii and Lucani in a second battle, to reduce their country the sooner, he divided his army into three bodies, posting them on three hills divided by deep vallies, and sending out from thence numerous parties to ravage the neighbouring countries. One of these vallies was washed by the Acheron, on the banks of which stood the small city of Pandosia. While Alexander continued in this camp, the vallies were by sudden rains laid under water, which broke off the communication between the three bodies of the king's forces. The enemy laid hold of this favourable opportunity to attack first the two posts, where the king was not, and which by reason of the inundation he could not any ways assist. These two bodies being without much ado defeated, and put to flight, the Brutii and Lucani without loss of time surrounded with all their forces the hill, on which the king himself was encamped. His guard consisted of two hundred Lucani, who being driven from their country had fled to him for refuge. These wrote to the generals of their nation, promising to deliver up to them the king of Epirus dead or alive, provided they would receive them into favour, and suffer them to return to their native country. The proposal was accepted, and the traitors only waited for a favourable opportunity to put their treachery in execution. As Alexander was a prince of great courage and resolution, in spite of all opposition he forced his way through the enemy's army, killed one of their generals with his own hand, and having with a small attendance made his escape, and gained a neighbouring wood, he took his rout from thence to the river, the name of which he knew not, with a design to break down the bridge after he had crossed it. But finding the bridge carried away by the violence of the inundation, he threw himself into the river on horseback, when one of the Epirots, who attended him, seeing him in danger of being drowned, cried out, Cursed Acheron, thou art justly called by a fatal name; for the Greek word Acheron signifies a torrent of grief. At these words Alexander, remembering the answer of the oracle, and fearing his fate approached, began to hesitate, being in suspense whether he should go quite cross the river or no. While he was thus wavering, one of his attendants cried out to him, Hasten, betrayed prince, hasten to the opposite bank; the Lucani, your guard, seek to destroy you. At these words the king turning about, and seeing the Lucani ready to fall upon him, drew his sword, and made what haste he could to reach the bank, which he had already gained when one of the traitors, discharging a dart at him, killed him on the spot. His body fell into the river, which carried it to the enemy's camp, where it was used with all the indignity which rage and revenge could suggest. After they had barbarously defaced it, they cut it in two, sending one part to Cosentia, and setting up the other as a mark for the soldiers to discharge their arrows and darts at. At length a woman, whose husband and children had been taken by Alexander's troops, intreating the soldiers with tears in her eyes, to give her the scattered remains of the unhappy prince, since she could easily purchase with them the redemption of her husband and children, that part of the body, which the soldiers possessed, was delivered to her, and conveyed by her means first to Metapontum, and from thence removed to Epirus, where they were consigned to Cleopatra and Olympias, the former the wife, the latter the sister of the deceased king. All the antients speak of this prince as no ways inferior either in courage or conduct to his nephew Alexander the Great; but he had the misfortune to engage on his first setting out with nations inured to the toils of war, and no less brave than his own Epirots; whence he used to say, that the country, which he proposed to conquer, was inhabited by men, whereas the provinces, his nephew Alexander went to subdue, were peopled by women only<sup>c</sup>: Thus he styled the effeminate nations of Asia, which the Macedonian had subdued. Orosius<sup>d</sup> tells us, that he was killed by the Samnites, while he was making the necessary preparations for a war with Rome, and adds, that he was in such favour with Philip his brother-in-law, as made the world believe that the inclination which that prince had for him, was more agreeable to the wickedness of those times, than to the laws of nature. Theodectes wrote a panegyric on this king, as Suidas informs us; he is also mentioned by Demosthenes<sup>e</sup>, and cried up as an able and experienced commander by all the antients who mention him.

Æacides. Alexander was succeeded in the kingdom by Æacides the son of Arybbas or Arybas, and grandson of Alcetas. This prince espousing the cause of Olympias against Cassander, raised a powerful army with a design to relieve her while besieged in the city of Pydna. But having on this occasion forced many of his subjects into the service much against their will, they began to mutiny in the camp, especially after they found all the passes leading to Pydna seized on by Atarctus, Cassander's general. Hereupon Æacides, being resolved at all events to attempt the relief of Olympias, disbanded all those who seemed unwilling to follow him in this expedition, and taking with him such only as shewed themselves ready to run the same risk with himself, he advanced towards Pydna; but he had scarce left Epirus, when those he had sent back revolted from him, and drawing their fellow-citizens into the same revolt, declared by a common decree of the state, that Æacides had forfeited the crown, banished him the kingdom, and entered into an alliance with Cassander. This, as Diodorus Siculus observes, was the first rebellion that had happened in Epirus from the time that Neoptolemus, the son of Achilles, had reigned there, the kingdom having ever before descended by right of succession from father to son <sup>w</sup>. Cassander immediately dispatched Lyciscus into Epirus to take upon him in his name the government of that kingdom, injoining him to use the natives with all possible moderation. However, the Epirots were soon reconciled to their king, and, recalling him from banishment, replaced him on the throne of his ancestors, which he did not long enjoy, being killed the same year in a battle fought with Philip the brother of Cassander <sup>x</sup>.

UPON his death the crown was conferred upon Alcetas his brother, who had been banished by his father Arybas on account of his violent temper. As he was an inveterate enemy to Cassander, Lyciscus, Cassander's general in Acarmania, marched with an army into Epirus, hoping, as the affairs of that kingdom were not yet well settled, to depose him. Alcetas hearing of the enemy's march, dispatched two of his sons, Alexander and Teucer, into all the provinces and cities of his dominions, to raise what forces they could; and in the mean time marched out himself with the few troops he had to make head against Lyciscus, whom he found encamped at Cassopia. As Lyciscus's army was far more numerous than the king's, they fell upon him before he had time to fortify his camp, and obliged him, after he had been abandoned by most of his troops, to shut himself up in the city of Eurymenas, where he was closely besieged. But in the mean time his son Alexander arriving with powerful succours, a sharp engagement ensued, in which great numbers of Lyciscus's men were cut off, and amongst the others Micythus, a commander of great reputation, Lyfander the Athenian, governor of Leucadia, and many other persons of distinction. A few days after this victory

Dinias brought new supplies for Lyciscus, whereupon a second battle being fought, Alexander and Teucer with their father Alcetas were forced to save themselves by flight, and abandon the city of Eurymenas to the enemy, who plundered it, and razed it to the ground. Cassander, upon the news of the defeat of his forces, not having received any intelligence of the victory they gained afterwards, hastened into Epirus to succour his general; but being informed on his arrival of the success that had attended him in the second engagement, instead of pursuing the war, he thought it adviseable to enter into a treaty with the Epirots; and having concluded a peace upon honourable terms, he withdrew his troops, and restored tranquillity to the kingdom of Epirus. Alcetas being thus disengaged from so troublesome a war, began to exercise, as he was a prince of a most tyrannical temper, all sorts of cruelties over his subjects; which so provoked them, that having made a general insurrection, they murdered both him and his two sons, Hesioneas and Nisus, who were then very young. Alexander and Teucer had the good fortune to make their escape, and never afterwards appeared in Epirus <sup>1</sup>.

Pyrrhus.

Alcetas was succeeded by Pyrrhus, a prince of great fame in history. He was the son of Æacides, of whom we have spoke above, by Philip the daughter of Menon the Theffalian, one of the Heraclidæ; so that Pyrrhus was by the father descended from Achilles, and from Hercules by the mother <sup>2</sup>. When the Epirots revolted from his father, and drove him from the throne, it was with much difficulty that Pyrrhus, then an infant at the breast, escaped falling into the hands of the rebels. He was after various adventures conveyed by Androcles and Angelus, two Epirot lords, to the court of Glaucias king of Illyricum, who, as some authors conjecture, had married his aunt Beroa, the daughter of Arybbas, and grand-daughter of king Alcetas <sup>3</sup>. Glaucias hesitated a great while, as Plutarch informs us <sup>4</sup>, before he would admit the young prince into his palace, the fear he was in of provoking Cassander, an implacable enemy to Æacides, keeping him in suspense. Hereupon those who had rescued the infant prince from the fury of the rebels had recourse to intreaties, and imploring the king's protection, laid the child at his feet, who taking hold of his royal robes, raised himself up, and with his arms grasped the king's knees. Hereupon Glaucias tenderly embracing him, and protesting that he would defend him at the hazard of his life and dominions, delivered him to his queen to be educated with his own children <sup>c</sup>. Other writers tell us, that the infant, actuated by some extraordinary impulse, fixed his eyes on the altars of the domestic gods; as if he claimed the protection of those deities, who were lovers of hospitality; and that Glaucias, struck at this sight, concluded, that the gods took the young prince under their protection, and thought it his duty to bring up young Pyrrhus with all possible care <sup>d</sup>. In the mean time Cassander, hearing that the unfortunate prince had found a retreat in the court of Glaucias, solicited the king to deliver him up into his hands; but neither his repeated instances, nor the two hundred talents he offered Glaucias, could induce him to commit so base an action; he was struck with horror at the proposal, rejected it with indignation; and having given the banished and persecuted prince an education suitable to his rank, as soon as he attained the twelfth year of his age, he sent him back into Epirus at the head of a powerful army, and placed him on the throne of his ancestors <sup>e</sup>. Justin tells us, that the Molossians, his subjects, changing their hatred into compassion, recalled him of their own accord, and assigned him guardians to govern the kingdom in his name till he was of age <sup>f</sup>. He enjoyed the kingdom in great peace and tranquillity till he was seventeen, when thinking himself sufficiently settled on the throne, he left Epirus for a while in order to be present in Illyricum at the nuptials of one of the sons of Glaucias, with whom he had been educated. But he was no sooner gone than the Molossians, taking advantage of his absence, revolted anew, drove all his friends out of the kingdom, seized on his treasures, and conferred the crown on Neoptolemus his great uncle. Pyrrhus being by this unexpected revolt divested of all his dominions, and destitute of sufficient succours, to recover them, retired to Demetrius, the son of Antigonus, commonly known by the surname of Poliorcetes, who had married his sister Deidamia. From that great commander he learnt the art of war, serving under him with the companions and fellow-soldiers of Alexander the Great. In the famous battle of Ipsus he distinguished himself, young as he was, in a very eminent manner, having fought with incredible bravery, and repulsed the enemy on that side, where he was posted <sup>g</sup>. Demetrius nevertheless lost the battle; but Pyrrhus very seasonably covered Greece, and saved for his brother-in-law the Greek cities, which that prince had confided to his care. Nor was this the only proof he gave of his affection for Demetrius; for a peace being at length concluded between him and Ptolemy by the interposition of Seleucus, Pyrrhus consented to be one of the hostages, who were sent into Egypt to secure the execution of the treaty.

DURING his abode at the court of Egypt he was generally admired for the sweetness of his temper, the regularity of his conduct, and his great dexterity and address in all sorts of manly exercises. His chief aim was to make his court to Berenice, who had the greatest ascendant over Ptolemy, and surpassed all the other women of the court in beauty as well as prudence. And herein he was very successful, for he so gained her by his noble and obliging behaviour, that she prevailed upon her husband to give him her daughter Antigone, in preference to several young princes who demanded her. Antigone was the daughter of the favourite queen by Philip her first husband, a Macedonian lord of no great fame. After Pyrrhus had married her, Berenice, desirous to see her daughter become a queen, induced Ptolemy to supply her son-in-law with sufficient forces to recover his kingdom. With these he sailed into Epirus, and having defeated in a battle Neoptolemus, whom the Molossians had placed on the throne, he recovered his paternal dominions. Neoptolemus had recourse to the neighbouring princes; but Pyrrhus, to avoid the evil consequences of a civil war, condescended to give him up part of his dominions. Neoptolemus at first seemed to be well satisfied with part of the kingdom; but having soon after at the instigation of the enemies of Pyrrhus attempted to poison him, he was by his orders put to death<sup>h</sup>. Pyrrhus having by his death got possession of the whole kingdom of Epirus, continued no longer idle in his dominions; but marching into the neighbouring countries performed those great feats we have described in the history of Macedon<sup>i</sup>, and therefore shall not repeat in this place.

THIS warlike prince being obliged by Lyfimachus to abandon the kingdom of Macedon, which he had taken from his brother-in-law Demetrius, as we have related elsewhere<sup>k</sup>, might have passed his days in tranquillity among his subjects, enjoying the sweets of peace, and governing his people agreeable to the rules of justice. But his restless temper, and unbounded ambition, made him seize with joy on the first op-Portunity that offered of plunging himself into new troubles.

THE inhabitants of Tarentum were then at war with the Romans, and not finding themselves in a condition to oppose so formidable an enemy with their own strength, they cast their eyes upon Pyrrhus, and dispatched ambassadors to him, not only from themselves, but from all the Greek cities in Italy, enjoining them to acquaint him, that they wanted only a leader of experience and reputation; that Tarentum was not the only city, whose forces would join him; that the Messapians, Lucanians, Samnites, Brutians, and many other rich and populous nations, weary either of bearing the Roman yoke, or of being in continual dread of it, were ready to assist him in exterminating the haughty and imperious republic; that he might depend on being supplied at his arrival with three hundred thousand foot, and twenty thousand horse, &c. The joy, with which Pyrrhus received a proposal so agreeable to his disposition, may be easily imagined. His head was filled with the exploits of Alexander the Great, and his frequently conversing with the generals, who had served under that conqueror, had strongly inclined him to attempt in the west what Alexander had with so much glory performed in the east. He therefore willingly closed with the proposal of the Tarentine ambassadors, promising to pass over into Italy with all possible expedition, and employ the whole strength of his kingdom in rescuing them from the oppression they groaned under. However, before he began to make the necessary preparations, he is said to have consulted the oracle of Delphos, about the success of his intended expedition; on which occasion the answer of the god was uttered in such terms as might equally signify, either that he should conquer the Romans, or the Romans him; but the desire he had of embarquing in this expedition made him interpret the ambiguous answer in his own favour<sup>1</sup>.

A Thessalian named Cynas was at this time Pyrrhus's prime minister and chief favourite. He was a man of most extraordinary parts, being an experienced officer, an able politician, and the most eloquent orator of his age: the art of oratory he had learned under Demosthenes, that of war under the companions of Alexander the Great, and politics by long experience, having been always employed by Pyrrhus in the most difficult negotiations. The art of persuasion, of which he was master, and the secret he had of insinuating himself into the affections of those he dealt with, enabled him to conquer all difficulties in the business he transacted for his master ; insomuch, that Pyrrhus himself used to say, that he had gained more cities by the eloquence and persuasive discourses of Cyneas, than he could possibly have conquered by force of arms. He was by profession a philosopher of the sect of Epicurus, which was not then come into disrepute through the ill use that corrupt men afterwards made of the principles they professed. At court he maintained the character of a man of virtue, and a lover of truth, who was not capable of deceiving by mean flatteries, and yet had submission enough to execute, without murmuring, the orders that were given contrary to his advice. Pyrrhus, who reposed an entire confidence in this great man, could not help communicating to him the vast projects he was forming : having therefore called him into his cabinet, after he had dismissed the Tarentine ambassadors, The Tarentines, said he, invite me over into Italy, which opens to me a large field of glory. To subdue the Romans is to conquer the west : and how easy is it to subdue them ! Hetrumia finds them employment on one hand, and all the nations on this side of the Tyber, quite to the sea-shore, are ready to take up arms under my command against that ambitious and haughty republic. Tell me impartially what you think of this expedition. Cyneas, without disapproving his design upon Italy, asked him whither he designed to turn his arms, if the gods should be so gracious as to crown his attempts upon that country with the wish'd-for success. To this question Pyrrhus without hesitation answered, that from Italy he designed to pass over into Sicily, where he should find all things in confusion on account of the death of king Agathocles, who had kept the Sicilians in awe. And how many fruitful provinces, said he, shall I find there, either ready to receive me after the conquest of Italy, or not in a condition to oppose my victorious troops ! And when Sicily shall have submitted to you, where do you intend to make war next ? replied Cyneas. The thing speaks itself, answered Pyrrhus ; from Sicily I will sail over into Africa. The Carthaginians are not invincible. Agathocles surprized them with a few ships, and was very near making himself king of Carthage. And when I shall have taken that city, who will be able to make head against me ? Macedon, which I formerly conquered, and every province of Greece, shall be part of my future conquests. And after all these victories, said Cyneas, how shall we employ ourselves, and dispose of our time ? I will then, subjoined Pyrrhus, take some rest after all my fatigues, and enjoy the pleasures of life with you. At these words the wise philosopher interrupting him, And what prevents you, said said he, from enjoying that happiness now, which you propose to seek through so many toils and labours, with the hazard of never being able to find it? Why should you purchase at so dear a rate, the gratifications which you may now enjoy without the least trouble? These words made some impression upon the king; but his ambition getting the better of his understanding, he persisted in his design; and covering his ambitious views with the appearance of virtue, It is hereditary in my family, said he, to assist the miserable: we ought not to make war for ourselves alone, but to relieve the oppressed. Being thus unalterably fixed in his design of subjecting all Italy, the better to conceal it, he caused a very artful clause to be inserted in his treaty with the Tarentines, viz. that when he had once relieved Tarentum, he should not be detained in Italy, but allowed to return to Epirus. He likewise required that some of the ambassadors should continue in his dominions, under pretence of assisting him in making the necessary preparations for war; but in reality, that they might be as so many hostages to secure the fidelity of the Tarentines <sup>m</sup>.

HAVING taken these prudent precautions, he immediately dispatched Cyneas with part of his fleet and a detachment of three thousand foot to Tarentum, where that artful minister soon changed the face of affairs, the chief men of the city being, notwithstanding the embassy they had sent to Pyrrhus, inclined to come to an agreement with the Romans; nay, they had even chosen for their chief magistrate one Agis, who was a sincere friend to the Romans, and acted in concert with L. Emilius Barbula the Roman general, hoping by that means to reconcile his countrymen to Rome, and make them lay aside their design of receiving the king of Epirus. But Cyneas by his eloquence and insinuating behaviour prevailed upon the Tarentines to depose Agis, and place one of the ambassadors, who had been sent into Epirus, in his room. After this he persuaded them to deliver up their citadel to one Milo an Epirot, who was arrived a few days before with fresh succours, and the agreeable news, that Pyrrhus would soon be there in person at the head of a numerous army. The Tarentines, impatient to see the king of Epirus among them, upon this advice dispatched their gallies and a great number of transports with all sorts of provisions and a large sum of money, to Epirus, in order to convey Pyrrhus with his troops and elephants safe to Tarentum. The convoy Pyrrhus no sooner arrived than the king imbarqued, Cyneas and Milo <sup>imbarques having paved the way for him so well, that his authority was already as well established in Tarentum, as in Epirus. Before the arrival of the Tarentine fleet he had settled the government of his dominions during his absence. He left Ptolemy, his son by Antigone the daughter of Berenice, who was then fifteen years old, regent of Epirus under the tuition of Ptolemy Ceraunus king of Macedon. He took his two younger sons Alexander and Helenus (L) with him into Italy, to amuse and entertain him in this long expedition. Before his departure, he had likewise borrowed ships, men, and money, of the kings his friends; so that his army consisted of twenty two thousand foot, three thousand horse, five hundred slingers, and fifty elephants, according to Justin<sup>n</sup>, which Plutarch reduces to twenty<sup>o</sup>. Among these troops were about seven thousand of those brave Macedonians, who had conquered Asia under Alexander the Great. His fleet was composed of the ships of Epirus, the gallies of Tarentum, and those which Antigonus Gonatus had sent him. With these he immediately set sail about the end of the winter, the eager desire he had of getting to Italy, not suffering him to wait for a more favourable season. But his impatience had like to have cost him dear; for he had scarce got out into the open sea, when a violent storm from the north drove him out of his course, and dispersed his fleet. (L) After the death of Antigone, the daughter of Berenice, Pyrrhus married several wives. The first was the daughter of Antoleon, king of the Pæonians. The second by name Bircenna, was the daughter of Bardullis, king of the Illyrians. The third was Lanassa, the daughter of Agathocles, king of Syracuse. The latter brought him the Island of Corcyra, which her father had seized, for her portion. By her he had Alexander; and Helenus, the youngest of all his children, by Bircenna. Plutarch tells us, that all the children of Pyrrhus derived a warlike genius from their father, which was greatly improved by their education, and adds, that one of them having asked him, to which of his children he designed to leave the kingdom of Epirus? the king answered, To him who has the sharpest sword. Lanassa, who was once his favourite wife, grew at last jealous of him, thinking he preferred his other wives to her, and retiring to Corcyra, there married Demetrius (102).

the care of the pilot and mariners the coast of Italy the first, after a voyage of infinite fatigue and danger. The few ships that followed the king struck against the rocks on the Messapian shore, and were dashed to pieces. While Pyrrhus was preparing to come ashore, the inhabitants having flocked from all quarters to see him, a fresh accident was very near destroying the deliverer of Italy, as they stiled him, and disappointing the expectation of the Tarentines. For a land wind rising all on a sudden with great violence, drove Pyrrhus out to sea again. This new danger was greater than any he had met with in his passage, the mariners expecting that his ship, being furiously beat by huge waves, would founder at each shock it sustained. In this extremity the intrepid Pyrrhus did not hesitate a moment, but as the shore was not far off, threw himself into the sea, and was immediately followed by his guards, and those friends he had on board, without doubt, to take care of his person, and save him at the danger of their own lives; but as the night was extremely dark, and the sea ran very high, he struggled with the waves till day-break, when the wind abating, he reached the land with the assistance of the Messapians, who stood on the shore. The long fatigue he had sustained during great part of the night, weakened him to such a degree, that he could not stand without being supported by his guards. But what gave him the greatest uneasiness was the apprehension he was under of his army being lost; for he had with him only two thousand men, a few horses, and two elephants, animals which had never before been seen in Italy. With these he crossed Messapia, and marched directly to Tarentum <sup>And himself in danger of being lost.</sup>.

Cyneas no sooner heard what had happened to Pyrrhus, but he advanced to meet him at the head of a strong detachment, and conducted him safe to Tarentum, where he was received with loud acclamations and all possible demonstrations of joy. The Tarentines, who were intirely devoted to their pleasures, expected that he should take all the fatigues of the war on himself, and expose his Epirots only to danger. And indeed Pyrrhus for some days dissembled his design, and suffered the Tarentines to indulge without restraint their usual diversions. But his ships, which had been dispersed all over the Ionian sea, arriving one after another, and with them the troops which he had put on board of them in Epirus, he began to reform the disorders that prevailed in the city. The theatre was the place to which the idle Tarentines resorted daily in great numbers, and where the incendiaries stirred up the people to sedition with their harangues ; he therefore caused it to be shut up, as he did likewise the public gardens, porticoes, and places of exercise, where the inhabitants used to entertain themselves with news, and speak with great freedom of their governors, censuring their conduct, and settling the government according to their different humours, which occasioned great divisions, and rent the city into various factions. As they were a very voluptuous and indolent people, they spent whole days and nights in feasts, masquerades, plays, &c. and these Pyrrhus absolutely prohibited as no less dangerous than the assemblies of prating politicians. They were utter strangers to military exercises and the art of handling arms ; but Pyrrhus having caused an exact register to be made of all the young men who were fit for war, picked out the strongest among them, and incorporated them among his own troops, saying, that he would take it upon him to give them courage. He exercised them daily for several hours, and on that occasion behaved himself with an inexorable severity, inflicting exemplary punishments on such as did not attend, or failed in their duty. By these wise measures he prevented seditions among the citizens, and inured their youth to military discipline ; and because many, who had not been accustomed to such severity and rigour, withdrew from their native country, Pyrrhus, by a public proclamation, declared all those guilty of death, who should attempt to abandon their country, or absent themselves from the common musters <sup>1</sup>.

THE Tarentines, being now sensible that Pyrrhus was determined to be their master, began loudly to complain of his conduct ; but he being informed of whatever passed among them by his spies, who insinuated themselves into all companies, privately dispatched the most factious, and sent those, whom he suspected, under various pretences, to his son's court in Epirus. Amongst the latter was Aristarchus, a famous orator, whose eloquence gave Pyrrhus no small jealousy ; for orators had in those days a great influence over the multitude, especially in the Greek cities where popular government obtained. As Aristarchus had, we may say, an absolute authority in the city, Pyrrhus made it his chief business to lessen his reputation among his fellow-citizens, pretending a strict friendship for the orator, and giving out, that in many things, which were displeasing to the Tarentines, he had acted according to his advice. But Aristarchus in his private discourses undeceived them, letting them know, that he entertained the same thoughts of Pyrrhus as the multitude. The king therefore, thinking it necessary to remove so dangerous an enemy, sent him to his son on an embassy, which, he said, was of the utmost importance. Aristarchus saw through the artifice, but pretending to be altogether unacquainted with it, accepted the deputation, and chusing a vessel, the commander of which was intirely at his devotion, set sail, as Pyrrhus imagined, for Epirus. But he had no sooner lost sight of the land, than he ordered the pilot to return to Italy, and put in at some port, from whence he might go safely by land to Rome. The pilot obeyed, and Aristarchus, on his arrival in that metropolis, acquainted the senate with the state of Tarentum and the designs of Pyrrhus. Hereupon Fabricius was immediately dispatched to visit the Roman colonies and the allies of the republic, to fortify some places, and exhort the cities to continue steady in their alliance with Rome. And truly these precautions were necessary, the allies of the republic being in many places inclined to desert her, and ready to join a king famous for his exploits, who promised them a happy deliverance from all manner of subjection<sup>r</sup>.

In the mean time P. Valerius Lævinus the Roman consul, entering the country of the Lucanians, who were in alliance with the Tarentines, committed great ravages there, and having taken and fortified one of their castles, waited in that neighbourhood for Pyrrhus. The king, tho' he had not yet received any succours from the Samnites, Messapians, and other allies of the Tarentines, thought it highly dishonourable to continue shut up in a city, while the Romans were ravaging the country of his friends. He therefore took the field with the troops he had brought with him from Epirus, some recruits of Tarentum, and a small number of Italians. But before he began hostilities, he wrote the following letter to Lævinus: Pyrrhus to Lævinus health. I am informed, that you command an army, which is to make war upon the Tarentines. Disband it without delay, and lay your pretensions before me. After I have heard both parties, I will give judgment, and know how to make my sentence be obeyed. Lævinus answered the king with all the haughtiness of a Roman: Know, Pyrrhus, that we neither admit you as a judge, nor fear you as an enemy. Does it become you to take upon you to judge us, who have yourself injured us by landing in Italy without the consent of our republic? We will have no arbitrator but Mars, the author of our race, and protector of our arms. The king, upon the receipt of this letter, immediately marched towards those parts where Lævinus was waiting for him. The Romans were encamped on the hither side of the river Siris; and Pyrrhus, appearing on the opposite bank, made it his first business to reconnoitre the enemy's camp in person, and see what appearance they made. With this view he crossed the river attended by Megacles one of his officers and chief favourites; and having observed the consul's intrenchments, the manner in which he had posted his advanced guards, and the good order of his camp, he was greatly surprized; and, addressing Megacles, These people, said he, are not such barbarians as we take them to be; let us try them before we condemn them (M). On his return he changed his resolution of attacking them, and shutting himself up in his intrenchments, waited for the arrival of the confederate troops. In the mean time he posted strong guards along the river to prevent the enemy from passing it, and continually sent out scouts to discover the designs, and watch the motions of the consul. Some of these being taken by the advanced guards of the Romans, the consul himself led them through his camp, and having shewed them his army, sent them back to the king, telling them, that he had many other troops to shew them in due time <sup>f</sup>.

(M) Aurelius Victor and Florus make Pyrrhus talk in a very different manner on this occasion, and altogether foreign to the purpose. The first tells us, that at the sight of the Roman army he cried out, that his fate was like that of Hercules, since he likewise had a hydra to encounter; and Florus, that when he saw the Roman troops, he complained of his being born under the same constellation with Hercules, since so many enemies, like the heads of the hydra of Lerna, started up out of their own blood. Cyneas, according to Plutarch, and not Pyrrhus, made this comparison, after he had observed how quickly the Roman army was recruited, and the legions filled up, notwithstanding the great loss they had sustained in the first battle. On this occasion the reflection of Cyneas was a very sensible one, and the comparison obvious and natural; but it would have been highly absurd in the circumstances in which the above-mentioned authors suppose Pyrrhus to have made it, that is, before he had engaged the Romans, or gained any victory over them; for how could he then compare them to the hydra, whose heads grew up as fast as Hercules cut them off?

cavalry to file off, and march a great way about, in order to find a passage at some place not defended by the enemy. Accordingly they passed the river without being observed, and falling upon the guards, which Pyrrhus had posted on the banks over-against the consular army, gave the infantry an opportunity of crossing the river on bridges, which Lævinus had prepared for that purpose. But before they got over, Pyrrhus hastening from his camp, which was at some distance from the river, hoped to cut the Roman army in pieces, while they were disordered with the difficulties of passing the river, and climbing up the steep banks. But the cavalry covering the infantry, and standing between them and the Epirots, gave them time to form themselves on the banks of the river. On the other hand, Pyrrhus drew up his men as fast as they came from the camp, and performed such feats of valour, that the Romans thought him worthy of the great reputation he had acquired.

As the cavalry alone had hitherto engaged, Pyrrhus, who confided most in his infantry, hastened back to the camp in order to bring them to the charge : but took two precautions before he began the attack ; the first was to ride through the ranks, and shew himself to the whole army ; for his horse having been killed under him in the first onset, a report had been spread that he was killed ; the second was to change his habit and helmet with Megacles ; for having been known in the engagement of the horse by the richness of his attire and armour, many of the Romans had aimed at him in particular, so that he was with the utmost difficulty taken up and saved after his horse was killed under him. Thus disguised, he led his phalanx against the Roman legions, and attacked them with incredible fury. Lævinus sustained the shock with great resolution, so that the victory was for many hours warmly disputed. The Romans gave several times way to the Epirots, and the Epirots to the Romans ; but both parties rallied again, and were brought back to the charge by their commanders. Megacles in the attire and helmet of Pyrrhus was in all places, and well supported the character he had assumed. But his disguise at last proved fatal to him : for a Roman knight, by name Dexter, taking him for the king, followed him where ever he went, and having found an opportunity of discharging a blow at him, struck him dead on the spot, stript him of his helmet and armour, and carried them in triumph to the consul, who by shewing to the Epirots the spoils of their king, so terrified them, that they began to give ground. But Pyrrhus appearing bare-headed in the first files of his phalanx, and riding through all the

the lines, undeceived his men, and inspired them with new courage. The advantage seemed to be pretty equal on both sides, when Lævinus ordered his cavalry to advance ; which Pyrrhus observing, drew up twenty elephants in the front of his army with towers on their backs full of bowmen. The very sight of those dreadful animals chilled the bravery of the Romans, who had never before seen them. However they still advanced, till their horses, not being able to bear the smell of them, and frightened at the strange noise they made, took head, and either threw their riders, or carried them off full stretch in spite of their utmost efforts. In the mean time the archers, discharging showers of darts from the towers, wounded several of the Romans in that confusion, while others were trod to death by the elephants. Notwithstanding the disorder of the cavalry, the legionaries still kept their ranks, and could not be broke, till Pyrrhus attacked them in person at the head of the Theffalian horse. The onset was so furious, that they were forced to yield, and retire in disorder. The king of Epirus restrained the ardour of his troops, and would not suffer them to pursue the enemy, an elephant which had been wounded by a Roman soldier, named Minuccius, having caused a great disorder in his army. This accident favoured the retreat of the Romans, and gave them time to repass the river, and take refuge in Apulia <sup>t</sup>. Dionysius Halicarnassæus make the loss of the Romans in this first battle amount to fifteen thousand men ; but Hieronimus, quoted by the same historian, reduces it to seven thousand : according to the former Pyrrhus lost thirteen thousand, and four thousand only according to the latter. The Epirot remained master of the field, and had the pleasure to see the Romans fly before him ; but the victory cost him dear, a great number of his best officers and soldiers having been slain in the battle ; whence he was heard to say after the action, that he was both conqueror and conquered, and that if he gained such another victory, he should be obliged to return to Epirus alone. He was so far from being elated with the advantage he had got, that when he hung up the spoils he had taken from the enemy, in the temple of Jupiter at Tarentum, he caused this memorable inscription to be engraved upon them : Great, Jupiter, I have conquered an invincible nation, and am conquered by the same <sup>u</sup> (N). His first care after the action was to bury the dead, with which the plain was covered ; and herein he made no distinction between the Romans and his own Epirots. In viewing the bodies of the former, he observed that none of them had received any dishonourable wounds, that they had all fallen in the posts assigned them, still held their swords in their hands, and shewed even after their death a certain martial air and fierceness in their faces ; and on this occasion it was, that he uttered those famous words : O that Pyrrhus had Romans for his soldiers, or the Romans Pyrrhus for their leader ! Together we should subdue the whole world <sup>w</sup>.

THE king of Epirus understood the art of war too well not to reap what advantage he could from his victory. He broke into the countries in alliance with the Romans like a torrent, plundered the lands of the republic, and made incursions even into the neighbourhood of Rome. Many cities opened their gates to him, and in a short time he made himself master of the greatest part of Campania. While he was in that fruitful province, subsisting his troops there at the expence of the Romans, he was joined by the Samnites, Lucanians, and Messapians, whom he had so long expected. After having reproached them for their delay, he gave them a good share of the spoils he had taken from the enemy ; and having by this means gained their affections, he marched without loss of time to lay siege to Capua ; but Lævinus having already received a reinforcement of two legions, threw some troops into the city, which obliged Pyrrhus to drop his design, and leaving Capua to march strait to Naples. Lævinus followed him, harassing his troops on their march, and at length, by keeping his army in that neighbourhood, forced him to give over all thoughts of making himself master of that important city. The king then all on a sudden took his rout towards Rome by the Latin Takes Freeway, surprised Fregellæ, and marching through the country gellæ. of the Hernici, sat down before Prænestæ. There from the top of a hill he had the pleasure of seeing Rome, and is said to have advanced so near the walls, that he drove a cloud of dust into the city. But he was soon forced to retire by the other consul T. Coruncanius, who having reduced Hebruria, was Raises the siege of Præneste, and returns to Campania. just then returned with his victorious army to Rome. The king of Epirus therefore, having no hopes of bringing the Hetrurians into his interest, and seeing two consular armies ready to fall upon him, raised the siege of Præneste, and hastened back into Campania, where, to his great surprise, he found Lævinus with a more numerous army than that which he had defeated on the banks of the Siris. The consul went to meet him with a design to try the fate of another battle, which Pyrrhus being unwilling to decline, drew up his army, and to strike terror into the Roman legions, ordered his men to beat their bucklers with their lances, and the leaders of the elephants to force them to make their hideous noise. But the noise was returned with such an universal shout by the Romans, that Pyrrhus, thinking so much alacrity on the part of the vanquished too sure a prognostic of victory, altered his mind, and, pretending that the auguries were not favourable, retired to Tarentum, and put an end to the campaign *.

The Romans send an embassy to him to desire an exchange of prisoners.

WHILE Pyrrhus continued quiet at Tarentum, he had time to reflect on the valour and conduct of the Romans; which made him conclude, that the war, in which he was engaged, must end in his ruin and disgrace, if not terminated by an honourable peace. He was therefore overjoyed when he heard that the senate had determined to send an honourable embassy to him, not doubting but their errand was to propose terms of peace. He pleased himself with the imagination of seeing those haughty republicans at his feet in a suppliant manner, and saying to them with the air of a conqueror, I grant you peace. In full expectation of this, he sent Lycon the Molossian to wait for them with a guard on the frontiers of Tarentum; and as they approached the city went out in person to meet them, received them with all possible marks of honour, and appointed them stately lodgings, commanding them to be plentifully supplied at the public expence with all necessaries. The ambassadors were three men of distinguished merit, viz. Cornelius Dolabella, who was famous for the signal victory he had gained over the Senones, the virtuous Fabricius, and Æmilius Papus, who had been his colleague in the consulate two years before. When they were admitted to an audience, the only thing they demanded was a surrender of the prisoners, either by way of exchange, or at such a ransom as should be agreed on; for Pyrrhus in the late battle had made eighteen hundred prisoners, most of them Roman knights, and men of distinction in the republic. They had fought with great bravery, till their horses, frightened with the roaring of the king's elephants, had either thrown them, or obliged them to dismount; by which unforeseen accident they had fallen into the enemy's hands. The senate therefore pitying the condition of those brave men, had determined, contrary to their custom, to redeem them. Pyrrhus was greatly surpris'd and disappointed when he found that they had no other proposals to make; but concealing his thoughts, he only answered, that he would consider of it, and let them know his resolution<sup>y</sup>.

ACCORDINGLY he assembled his council; but his chief favourites were divided in their opinions. Milo, who commanded in the citadel of Tarentum, was for coming to no composition with the Romans; but Cyneas, who knew his master's inclination, propos'd not only sending back the prisoners without ransom, but dispatching an embassy to Rome to treat with the senate of a lasting peace. His advice was approved, and he himself appointed to go on that embassy. After these resolutions the king acquainted the ambassadors that he intended to release the prisoners without ransom, since he had already riches enough, and desired nothing of their republic but her friendship. Afterwards he had several private conferences with Fabricius, whose virtue he tried with mighty offers of riches and grandeur; but finding him proof against all temptations, he resolv'd to try whether his intrepidity and courage were equal to his virtue. With this view he caus'd an elephant to be placed behind a curtain in the hall where he receiv'd the Roman ambassador. As Fabricius had never seen one of those beasts, the king taking a turn or two in the hall with him brought him within the elephant's reach, and then caus'd the curtain to be drawn all on a sudden, and that monstrous animal to make his usual noise, and even lay his trunk on Fabricius's head. But the intrepid Roman, without betraying the least fear or concern, Does the great king, said he, with surprizing calmness, who could not stagger me with his offers, think to frighten me with the braying of a beast? Pyrrhus, astonish'd at his immoveable constancy invit'd him to dine with him; and on this occasion it was, that the conversation turning upon the Epicuræan philosophy, Fabricius made that celebrated exclamation; O that Pyrrhus, both for Rome's sake and his own, had plac'd his happiness in the boasted indolence of Epicurus!<sup>z</sup>

ed his earnestness for peace. He sent for the three ambassadors, released two hundred of the prisoners without ransom, and suffered the rest, on their parole, to return to Rome to celebrate the Saturnalia, or feasts of Saturn, in their own families. Having by this obliging behaviour gained the goodwill of the Roman ambassadors, he sent the famous Cyneas to Rome almost at the same time that they left Tarentum. The instructions he gave this faithful minister were to bring the Romans to grant these three articles: 1. That the Tarentines should be included in the treaty made with the king of Epirus: 2. That all the Greek cities in Italy should be suffered to enjoy their laws and liberties: 3. That the republic should restore to the Samnites, Lucanians, and Brutians, all the places she had taken from them. Upon these conditions Pyrrhus declared himself ready to forbear all further hostilities, and conclude a lasting peace. With these instructions Cyneas set out for Rome, where partly by his eloquence, partly by rich presents to the senators and their wives, he soon gained a good number of voices. When he was admitted into the senate, he made an harangue worthy of a disciple of the great Demosthenes; after which he read the conditions Pyrrhus proposed, and with a great deal of eloquence endeavoured to shew the reasonableness and moderation of his master's demands, asking leave for Pyrrhus to come in person to Rome to conclude and sign the treaty. The senators were generally inclined to agree to Pyrrhus's terms; but nevertheless, as several senators were absent, the determination of the affair was postponed to the next day, when Appius Claudius, the greatest orator and most learned civilian in Rome, old and blind as he was, caused himself to be carried to the senate, where he had not appeared for many years; and there, what with his eloquence, what with his authority, so prepossessed the minds of the senators against the king of Epirus and the conditions he offered, that when he had done speaking, the conscript fathers unanimously passed a decree, the substance of which was, that the war with Pyrrhus should be continued; that his ambassador should be sent back that very day; that the king of Epirus should not be permitted to come to Rome; and that they should acquaint his ambassador, that Rome would enter into no treaty of peace with his master till he had left Italy <sup>a</sup>.

Cyneas, surprized at the answer given him, left Rome the same day, and returned to Tarentum, to acquaint the king with the final resolution of the senate. Pyrrhus, on hearing

it, admired the constancy and intrepidity of a conquered people, who spoke the language of conquerors; and having asked Cyneas his opinion of the senate, into which he had been introduced, that minister told him, that the senate seemed to him an assembly of kings, whose appearance filled the spectators with awe and reverence. This answer greatly increased the esteem Pyrrhus had for the Romans; he would have willingly concluded a peace with them upon any honourable terms; but as the conditions they offered were not by any means consistent with the reputation of his arms, he began, without loss of time, to make all due preparations for the next campaign. On the other hand, the Romans, having raised to the consulate P. Sulpitius Saverrio, and P. Decius Mus, dispatched them both into Apulia, where they found Pyrrhus incamped near a little town called Asculum. There the consuls, joining their armies, fortified themselves at the foot of the Apennines, having between them and the enemy a large deep stream, which divided the plain. Both armies continued a great while on the opposite banks, before either ventured to pass it to attack the other. The Epirots, being informed that the father and grandfather of the consul Decius had, by devoting themselves to the Dii Manes, gained victories, when every thing threatened the total defeat of their troops, believed that the Decii transmitted from father to son some unaccountable art of necromancy, whereby they secured the victory to their party whenever they lost their lives in the battle. This vain apprehension filled the Epirots with terror; and Pyrrhus, to destroy so dangerous a prepossession, sent a messenger to Decius, acquainting him, that if he attempted to devote himself, he should find the Epirots upon their guard; and resolved not to put him to death, but to take him alive, and that the most cruel punishments should be inflicted upon him as an impostor after the battle. To this message the consuls returned the following answer; Pyrrhus is not so formidable an enemy as to reduce us to expedients, which we make use of only in the greatest and inevitable dangers. To shew how little we fear him, we offer him his choice, either to pass the river unmolested, or to suffer us to do so; we shall then try in the open field, and upon equal terms, which of us shall have need of employing extraordinary methods to gain the victory. The king could not in point of honour decline the challenge, and therefore chose to continue where he was, and let the Romans cross the stream; which they did accordingly, and drew up in the plain. On the other hand, Pyrrhus placed his men likewise in order of battle in the same plain; and all the antients do him the justice to say, that no commander ever understood better the art of drawing up an army, and directing its motions. In the right wing he placed his Epirots and the Samnites, in his left the Lucanians, Brutians, and Salentines, and his phalanx in the centre. The centre of the Roman army consisted of four legions, which were to engage the enemy's phalanx; on their wings were posted the light-armed auxiliaries and the Roman horse. The consuls, in order to guard their troops against the fury of the elephants, had prepared chariots, armed with long points of iron in the shape of forks, and filled with soldiers carrying firebrands, which they were directed to throw at the elephants, and by that means frighten them, and set their wooden towers on fire. These chariots were posted over-against the king's elephants, and ordered not to stir till they entered upon action. To this precaution the Roman generals added another, which was, to order a body of Apulian troops to attack Pyrrhus's camp in the heat of the engagement, in order to force it, or at least to draw off part of the enemy's forces to defend it. At length the attack began, both parties being pretty equal in number; for each of them consisted of about forty thousand men. The phalanx sustained for a long time the furious onset of the legions with incredible bravery; but at length being forced to give way, Pyrrhus commanded his elephants to advance, but not on the side where the Romans had posted their chariots; they marched round, and falling upon the Roman horse, soon put them into confusion. Then the phalanx, returning with fresh courage to the charge, made the Roman legions in their turn give ground. On this occasion Decius was killed, so that one consul only was left to command the two Roman armies. But while all things seemed to favour Pyrrhus, the body of Apulians, which we have mentioned above, falling unexpectedly on the camp of the Epirots, obliged the king to dispatch a strong detachment to defend his intrenchments. Upon the departure of these troops, some of the Epirots, imagining that the camp was taken, began to lose courage, and retire; those who were next to them followed their example, and in a short time the whole army gave way. Pyrrhus having attempted several times in vain to rally his forces, returned to the charge with a small number of his friends, and the most courageous of his officers. With these he sustained the fury of the victorious legions, and covered the retreat of his own men. But being after a most gallant behaviour dangerously wounded, he retired at last with his small band in good order, leaving the Romans masters of the field. As the sun was near setting,

And the Romans extremely fatigued, and a great number of them wounded, the consul Sulpicius, not thinking it advisable to pursue the enemy, founded a retreat, repassed the stream, and brought his troops back to the camp (O). Sulpicius appeared in the field of battle the next day, with a design to bring the Epirots to a second engagement; but finding they had withdrawn in the night to Tarentum, he likewise retired, and put his troops into winter quarters in Apulia <sup>b</sup>.

BOTH armies continued quiet in their quarters during winter; but early in the spring took the field anew. The Romans were commanded this year by two men of great fame, whom they had raised to the consulate the second time; these were the celebrated C. Fabricius and Q. Æmilius Papus, who no sooner arrived in Apulia, than they

(O) Historians give us very different accounts of the battle of Asculum. Plutarch, who will have it to have been a double action, relates it thus: Pyrrhus, says he, was pent up in a place, where the cavalry could not be of any use; and could not bring up his elephants, the ground being very marshy. In this disadvantageous post many of his men were killed, and more wounded; so that night alone which put an end to the battle, saved him from an intire defeat. The next day the king, to retrieve his reputation, took possession of a more even ground, where he placed his elephants. Early in the morning, having seized those narrow passes, which had proved fatal to his army the day before, he drew up his men in the plain, posting a great number of archers and pikemen among his elephants. In this order he advanced towards the enemy, and charged the Roman troops with incredible fury. The legions fought a long time with great bravery; but at length, not being able to withstand the elephants, betook themselves to flight (103). On the other hand, Eutropius tells us, that the Romans gained a complete victory, that Pyrrhus lost his elephants in the action, and was obliged, though wounded, to fly to Tarentum to avoid falling into the enemy's hands (104). But his account is contradicted by other historians. Dionysius Halicarnassæus, as quoted by Plutarch, says, that there was but one battle fought near the city of Asculum; that the success of this great action was doubtful; that Pyrrhus was wounded in the arm with a spear, and that his baggage was plundered by the Samnites. The same author makes Pyrrhus on this occasion give that famous answer to one, who congratulated him on his victory, Such another would undo me (105).

marched their troops into the territory of Tarentum. Pyrrhus, who had received considerable reinforcements from Epirus, met them near the frontiers, and encamped at a small distance from the Roman army. While the consuls were waiting here for a favourable opportunity to give battle, a messenger from Nicias, the king's physician, delivered a letter to Fabricius, wherein the traitor offered to take off his master by poison, provided the consul would promise him a reward proportionable to the greatness of the service. The virtuous Roman, being filled with horror at the bare proposal of such a crime, immediately communicated the affair to his colleague, who readily joined with him in writing a letter to Pyrrhus, wherein they warned him, without discovering the criminal, to take care of himself, and be upon his guard against the treacherous designs of those about him. The letter was couched in the following terms: C. Fabricius, and Q. Æmilius consuls, to king Pyrrhus, health. You are unhappy both in the choice of your friends and enemies. This letter will satisfy you, that the former are the worst of men, and the latter persons of honour and probity. You are betrayed, Pyrrhus, and the man, who ought to be most faithful to you, offers to poison you. We give you this information, not to curry favour with you, but fearing lest we should be suspected of consenting to an assassination, which we detest and abhor. We do not desire to end the war by secret and wicked attempts, but openly, and with our swords. Pyrrhus, out of a deep sense of gratitude for so great a benefit, released immediately without ransom all the prisoners he had taken. But the Romans, disdaining to accept either a favour from an enemy, or a recompense for not committing the blackest treachery, declared, that they would not receive their prisoners but by way of exchange; and accordingly sent to Pyrrhus an equal number of Samnite and Tarentine prisoners <sup>d</sup>.

As the king of Epirus grew every day more weary of a war, which he feared would end in his disgrace, he sent Cyneas a second time to Rome, to try whether he could with his artful harangues prevail upon the conscript fathers to hearken to an accomodation, upon such terms as were consistent with his honour. But the embassador found the senators steady in their former resolution, and determined not to enter into any treaty with his master till he had left Italy, and withdrawn from thence all his forces. This gave the king great uneasiness; for he had already lost most of his veteran troops and best officers, and was sensible that he should lose the rest if he ventured another engagement. While he was revolving these melancholy thoughts in his mind, ambassadors arrived at his camp from the Syracusians, Agrigentines, and Lentines, imploring the assistance of his arms to drive out the Carthaginians, and put an end to the troubles which threatened their respective states with utter destruction. Pyrrhus, who wanted only some honourable pretence to leave Italy, sets sail laid hold of this, and, appointing Milo governor of Tarentum, for Sicily. with a strong garison to keep the inhabitants in awe during his absence, set sail for Sicily with thirty thousand foot and two thousand five hundred horse, on board a fleet of two hundred ships. We have elsewhere related at length the great success that attended him at first in Sicily; but the face of his affairs soon changed there likewise. The Sicilians, disgusted at the resolution he had taken of passing over into Africa, and much more at the enormous exactions and extortions of his ministers and courtiers, had submitted partly to the Carthaginians, and partly to the Mamertines. When Carthage heard of this change, new troops were raised all over Africa, and a numerous army sent into Sicily to recover the cities which Pyrrhus had taken. As the Sicilians daily deserted from him in crowds, he was no ways in a condition with his Epirots alone to withstand so powerful an enemy; and therefore when deputies came to him from the Tarentines, Samnites, Brutians, and Lucanians, representing to him the losses they had sustained since his departure, and remonstrating, that without his assistance they must fall a sacrifice to the Romans, he laid hold of that opportunity to abandon the island and return to Italy. His fleet was attacked by that of Carthage, and his army after their landing by the Mamertines, as we have related in the history of Syracuse. But Pyrrhus having by his heroic bravery escaped all danger, marched along the sea-shore in order to reach Tarentum that way. As he passed through the country of the Locrians, who had not long before massacred the troops he had left there, he not only exercised all sorts of cruelty on the inhabitants, but plundered the temple of Proserpine to supply the wants of his army. The immense riches which he found there were by his orders sent to Tarentum by sea; but the ships that carried them, being dashed against the rocks by a tempest, and the mariners all lost, this proud prince being convinced, says

We give you this information, not to curry favour with you, but fearing lest we should be suspected of consenting to an assassination, which we detest and abhor. We do not desire to end the war by secret and wicked attempts, but openly, and with our swords. Pyrrhus, out of a deep sense of gratitude for so great a benefit, released immediately without ransom all the prisoners he had taken. But the Romans, disdaining to accept either a favour from an enemy, or a recompense for not committing the blackest treachery, declared, that they would not receive their prisoners but by way of exchange; and accordingly sent to Pyrrhus an equal number of Samnite and Tarentine prisoners <sup>d</sup>.

As the king of Epirus grew every day more weary of a war, which he feared would end in his disgrace, he sent Cyneas a second time to Rome, to try whether he could with his artful harangues prevail upon the conscript fathers to hearken to an accomodation, upon such terms as were consistent with his honour. But the embassador found the senators steady in their former resolution, and determined not to enter into any treaty with his master till he had left Italy, and withdrawn from thence all his forces. This gave the king great uneasiness; for he had already lost most of his veteran troops and best officers, and was sensible that he should lose the rest if he ventured another engagement. While he was revolving these melancholy thoughts in his mind, ambassadors arrived at his camp from the Syracusians, Agrigentines, and Leontines, imploring the assistance of his arms to drive out the Carthaginians, and put an end to the troubles which threatened their respective states with utter destruction. Pyrrhus, who wanted only some honourable pretence to leave Italy, sets sail laid hold of this, and, appointing Milo governor of Tarentum, for Sicily. with a strong garison to keep the inhabitants in awe during his absence, set sail for Sicily with thirty thousand foot and two thousand five hundred horse, on board a fleet of two hundred ships. We have elsewhere related at length the great success that attended him at first in Sicily; but the face of his affairs soon changed there likewise. The Sicilians, disgusted at the resolution he had taken of passing over into Africa, and much more at the enormous exactions and extortions of his ministers and courtiers, had submitted partly to the Carthaginians, and partly to the Mamertines. When Carthage heard of this change, new troops were raised all over Africa, and a numerous army sent into Sicily to recover the cities which Pyrrhus had taken. As the Sicilians daily deserted from him in crowds, he was no ways in a condition with his Epirots alone to withstand so powerful an enemy; and therefore when deputies came to him from the Tarentines, Samnites, Brutians, and Lucanians, representing to him the losses they had sustained since his departure, and remonstrating, that without his assistance they must fall a sacrifice to the Romans, he laid hold of that opportunity to abandon the island and return to Italy. His fleet was attacked by that of Carthage, and his army after their landing by the Mamertines, as we have related in the history of Syracuse. But Pyrrhus having by his heroic bravery, escaped all danger, marched along the sea-shore in order to reach Tarentum that way. As he passed through the country of the Locrians, who had not long before massacred the troops he had left there, he not only exercised all sorts of cruelty on the inhabitants, but plundered the temple of Proserpine to supply the wants of his army. The immense riches which he found there were by his orders sent to Tarentum by sea; but the ships that carried them, being dashed against the rocks by a tempest, and the mariners all lost, this proud prince being convinced, says

Livy<sup>8</sup>, that the gods were not imaginary beings, caused all the treasure, which the sea had thrown upon the shore, to be carefully gathered up, and replaced in the temple; nay, to appease the wrath of the angry goddess, he put all those to death, who had advised him to plunder her temple. However, superstition made the antients ascribe to this act of impiety all the misfortunes which afterwards befel that unhappy prince.

Arrives at Tarentum

Pyrrhus at length arrived at Tarentum; but of the army he had carried into Sicily, he brought back into Italy only three thousand horse and not quite twenty thousand foot, a small body indeed to cope with two consular armies. He therefore reinforced them with the best troops he could raise in the countries of the Samnites, Lucanians, and Brutians; and hearing that the two new consuls, Curius Dentatus and Cornelius Lentulus, had divided their forces, the one invading Lucania, and the other Samnium, he likewise divided his army into two bodies, marching with the choice of his Epirots against Dentatus in hopes of surprizing him in his camp near Beneventum. But the consul having notice of his approach, went out of his intrenchments with a strong detachment of legionaries to meet him, repulsed his van-guard, put many of the Epirots to the sword, and took some of their elephants. Curius, encouraged with this first success, marched his army into the Taurasian fields, and drew it up in a plain, which was wide enough for his troops, but too narrow for the Epirot phalanx, the phalangites being so crowded, that they could not handle their arms without difficulty. But the king's eagerness to try his strength and skill with so renowned a commander, made him engage at so great a disadvantage. Upon the first signal the action began, and one of the king's wings giving way, the victory seemed to incline to the Romans. But that wing where the king fought in person repulsed the enemy, and drove them back quite to their intrenchments. This advantage was in great part owing to the elephants, which Curius perceiving, commanded a corps-de-reserve, which he had posted near the camp, to advance, and fall upon the elephants. These carrying burning torches in one hand, and their swords in the other, threw the former at the elephants, and with the latter defended themselves against their guides, by which means they were both forced to give way. The elephants being put to flight broke into the phalanx, close as it was, and there caused a general disorder, which was encreas-

ed by a remarkable accident : For it is said, that a young elephant being wounded, and thereupon making a dreadful noise, the mother quitting her rank, and hastening to the assistance of her young one, put those, who still kept their ranks, into the utmost confusion. But however that be, it is certain that the Romans obtained at last a complete victory <sup>h</sup>. Orosius <sup>i</sup> and Eutropius <sup>k</sup> tell us, that Pyrrhus's army consisted of fourscore thousand foot and six thousand horse, including his Epirots and allies, whereas the consular army was scarce twenty thousand men strong. Those who exaggerate the king's loss say, that the number of the slain on his side amounted to thirty thousand men ; but others reduce it to twenty thousand. All writers agree, that Curius took twelve hundred prisoners and eight elephants. This victory, which was the most decisive Rome had ever gained, brought all Italy under subjection, and paved the way for those vast conquests, which afterwards made the Romans masters of the whole known world.

Pyrrhus being no ways in a condition, after the great loss he had sustained, to keep the field, retired to Tarentum, being attended only by a small body of horse, leaving the Romans in possession of his camp, which they so much admired, that they made it ever after a model to form theirs by. And now the king of Epirus resolved to leave Italy as soon as possible, but concealed his design, and endeavoured to keep up the drooping spirits of his allies by giving them hopes of speedy succours from Greece. Accordingly he dispatched ambassadors into Ætolia, Illyricum, and Macedon, demanding supplies of men and money. But the answers from those courts not proving favourable, he forged such as might please those whom he was willing to deceive, and by this means supported the courage of his friends, and kept his enemy in play. When he could conceal his departure no longer, he pretended to be on a sudden in a great passion at the dilatoriness of his friends in sending him succours, and acquainted the Tarentines that he must go and bring them over himself. However, he left behind him a strong garison in the citadel of Tarentum under the command of the same Milo, who had kept it for him during his stay in Sicily. In order to keep this governor in his duty, he is said to have made him a very strange present, viz. a chair covered with the skin of Nicias, the treacherous

After all these disguises and precautions Pyrrhus at last set sail for Epirus, and arrived safe at Acroceraunium with eight thousand foot and five hundred horse, after having spent, to no purpose, six years in Italy and Sicily <sup>m</sup>.

On his return he found his treasures exhausted, and his people discouraged. To retrieve therefore his reputation, and make his troops some amends for the hardships they had suffered in Italy, he resolved to invade Macedon, where Antigonus Gonatus, who had refused to send him any succours, then reigned; and being reinforced with some companies of Gauls, he ravaged the country, took many cities, overthrew Antigonus in a pitched battle; and notwithstanding that prince had a great many Gauls in his pay, Pyrrhus drove him from place to place, and at length made himself master of the whole kingdom of Macedon. After the victory which he gained over Antigonus, he hung up the spoils of the Gauls in the temple of Pallas of Itonia, a small city between Phera and Larissa, with the following inscription; Pyrrhus king of the Molossians, consecrates to the Itonian Minerva these bucklers of the fierce Gauls, after having defeated the whole army of Antigonus. The descendants of Æacus are still the same, brave and valiant <sup>n</sup>. Pyrrhus having taken Æge, the royal seat of the late kings of Macedon, treated the inhabitants with great severity, and on his leaving the place, garisoned it with part of his Gauls, who being told that rich treasures were concealed in the tombs of the kings who were buried there, opened them, and after having carried away the wealth they found in them, threw the bones of the princes, whose remains were deposited there, about the streets, and sacrilegiously trampled them under foot. Pyrrhus dissembled his knowledge of this infamous action, being unwilling to alienate the minds of those barbarians by inflicting on them the punishment they well deserved; and this shameful connivance raised a general disaffection among the Macedonians, who had abandoned Antigonus to side with him.

Antigonus after his defeat had retired into Theffalonica with the remains of his shattered army, intending to wait there for a favourable opportunity of recovering his kingdom. But Ptolemy the son of Pyrrhus, a prince who almost equalled his father in bravery, though at that time but twenty two years of

It was natural for Pyrrhus after theſe conqueſts, which had both enriched and increaſed his army, to return to the aſſiſtance of the Tarentines and his allies in Italy. But his in- conſtancy, or rather the fear he was in of the Romans, made him take another courſe. New enemies and new hopes drew him into Peloponneſus, whither he took with him his two ſons, Ptolemy and Helenus, inſtead of leaving at leaſt one of them in Macedon to keep that country in awe, and watch the motions of Antigonus. He had been invited thither by Cleonymus king of Sparta, who being driven from his capital by Arcus his ambitious nephew, and by the intrigues of his wife Chelidonis, had recourſe to Pyrrhus, whoſe victories had made him famous all over Greece. The king, who was ever paſſing from one enterprize to another, readily complied with the requeſt of Cleonymus, and taking with him five and twenty thouſand foot, two thouſand horſe, and twelve elephants, entered Peloponneſus, not ſo much with a deſign to re-eſtabliſh Cleonymus, as to make himſelf maſter of all Greece. But the obſtinate reſiſtance he met with at Lacedæmon, not only from the men, but alſo from the women, who, on that occaſion, behaved like true heroines, obliged him to drop this enterprize, as we have related at length in the hiſtory of the Lacedæmonians <sup>b</sup>. He had ſcarce reſolved with himſelf to retire from before Lacedæmon, when a new project made him haſten his departure, in order to try his fortune in another quarter.

Ariſtippus and Ariſtias, two of the principal citizens of Argos, having excited a great ſedition in that city, the former to make good his party againſt his rival, had drawn Antigonus into his intereſt, which was enough for the latter to call Pyrrhus to his aſſiſtance. The king was overjoyed at the arrival of an expreſs from Ariſtias, inviting him to engage in a new war; and deſpiſing Antigonus, who had already recovered great part of Macedon, he drew off from Lacedæmon, and haſtened to Argos. But Arcus, having timely notice of his departure, concealed his troops in the moſt difficult paſſes, and having ſuffered the advanced guard of the Epirot army, commanded by Pyrrhus, to march by, fell unexpectedly on the rear, and cut off a great number of the Gauls and Molossians, who composed it. Hereupon Pyrrhus detached his son Ptolemy to their relief; but the young prince, suffering himself to be hurried on by his too great courage, was killed in the engagement by one Orasus a Cretan. The king being informed of his son's death, which affected him in a very sensible manner, suddenly faced about, and falling upon the Lacedæmonian cavalry, who under the command of Evalcus, an officer of great reputation, had imprudently advanced into the plain, made a great havock of those troops. He was always dreadful in battles, but on this occasion, when grief and the desire of revenge inflamed his natural ardor, he even surpassed himself. He singled out Evalcus in the throng, and breaking through the troops that surrounded him, killed him on the spot at the first blow. The death of so brave a man disheartened the Lacedæmonians, who now began to give ground. On the other hand the Epirots, being animated by the example of their king, pursued the advantage with such ardor, that the enemy was put into the utmost confusion, and at length obliged to save themselves by a disorderly flight, after having lost the greatest part of their cavalry. After this victory, when the dead body of his son was brought to him, he expressed the deepest concern; but at the same time seemed to blame him on account of his too great boldness, saying, I am not at all surprized that my son has lost his life; I did not expect he would have lived so long. Pyrrhus, having thus revenged the death of Ptolemy with streams of Lacedæmonian blood, pursued his march to Argos, and arriving before that city, encamped in an advantageous situation at a small distance from Antigonus, who had got there before him. The very next morning he sent a herald to Antigonus, challenging him to a single combat; but that prince returned him the following answer; If Pyrrhus is tired of his life, he may find ways enough to put an end to it. The inhabitants of Argos seeing two foreign kings ready to engage at their gates, and not doubting but the conqueror would seize on their city, and from a free people reduce them to a state of slavery, sent ambassadors to both princes, intreating them to withdraw their forces, and suffer the citizens to compose their differences by themselves. Antigonus readily consented to this proposal, and, to convince them that he had no design upon their city, delivered up his son to them as an hostage. Pyrrhus likewise promised to retire; but as he offered no security for the performance of his promise, the Argians began to suspect him of insincerity.

infincerity. And indeed not without reason, the factious Aristias having agreed to open one of the gates to him that very night, and put him in possession of the city. The traitor kept his word, opening the gate in the dead of the night, and conveying a body of Pyrrhus's Gauls into the market-place, which was in the centre of the city, without being discovered by any of Aristippus's party. But Pyrrhus, not thinking that body sufficient to make head against the citizens, ordered his elephants to advance, with a design to draw them up likewise in the market-place. But it unfortunately happened, that the gate, which was delivered up to Pyrrhus, was not high enough for the elephants to pass with their towers on their backs ; so that it was necessary to take them off, and replace them after they had entered the city. As this could not be effected in the dark without some noise, the Argians hearing it ran to arms, and finding the enemy posted in the centre of the city, fled to the fortress, and from thence sent messengers to Antigonus, pressing him to advance without loss of time to their assistance. He immediately marched up to the walls, and ordered his son Alcioneus to enter the city at the head of his best troops. In this critical juncture Areus king of Lacedæmon arrived likewise at Argos, with a thousand Lacedæmonians and the same number of Cretans ; and joining the Macedonians, charged the Gauls with the utmost fury, and threw them into disorder. Pyrrhus hastened to their relief with a body of Molossians ; but the darkness and confusion were so great, that he could neither be heard nor obeyed. The fight lasted all night, and at break of day the streets appeared covered with dead bodies, and streaming with blood, the Macedonians, Argians, Cretans, Epirots, Gauls, and Lacedæmonians, having fought all pell-mell in the dark, without distinguishing their friends from their foes. Pyrrhus was not a little surprized to see the city filled with the enemy's troops ; and imagining all was lost, thought of nothing but a timely retreat. As he was under some apprehension with respect to the gates of the city, which were too narrow, he sent orders to his son Helenus, whom he had left without with the main body of the army, to make a large breach in the wall, and be ready to cover his retreat, in case he should be overpowered by the enemy. But the person he sent to his son, misunderstanding his orders, delivered a quite contrary message ; in consequence of which Helenus, instead of making a breach in the wall, drew out the flower of his troops, and attempted to get in at the gate in order to assist his father. But the passage being stopt up by an elephant of an enormous size, size, and the Argians crowding about the gate to prevent Helenus from entering it, a sharp engagement ensued, in which great numbers were killed on both sides. At length Helenus, fearing lest his father might be in danger, forced his passage through the thickest of the enemy's ranks, and made way for the rest of his forces to follow him. But he had scarce got in, when he met his father surrounded by the enemy on all sides, and fighting his way through them in order to retire by the same gate out of the city, which he could no longer hold, most of his men being either killed or wounded. The troops which Helenus led, were so thronged under the gate, that they wounded one another with their arms, and so obstructed the passage, that it was impossible for Pyrrhus to get through them. He often cried aloud to them to retire, and clear the way; but his voice not being heard in that noise and confusion, they still continued to advance pressing upon one another, and putting the few troops that were with the king in great disorder. Hereupon Pyrrhus pulling off his diadem, to prevent his being known, faced about, and charged the enemy with the utmost fury. While he was thus fighting in the croud, and making a great slaughter of the enemy, a common soldier of Argos attacked and wounded him with his javelin. Hereupon the king, inflamed at the sight of his blood, flew at the aggressor with a rage not to be expressed, and was ready to make him pay dear for his boldness; but the mother of the Argian, who with other women beheld the combat from the top of a house, being alarmed at the imminent danger of her son, threw down a tile, the first thing she laid hold of, upon Pyrrhus, which falling upon his head, gave him such a blow, that he staggered a while, and fell senseless to the ground; which one Zopyrus a Macedonian observing, and knowing who he was, dragged him into a porch, and there with a trembling hand cut off his head, and carried it to Alcioneus, who rid full speed with it to his father Antigonus, and threw it down at his feet. But that prince, reflecting on the instability of human affairs and vicissitude of fortune, severely rebuked his son for thus insulting over the remains of so great a man; and taking up the head covered it with his own garment, and caused it to be honourably interred.

ed by the Romans themselves, and by a person the most worthy to be credited with relation to the merit of a warrior, and the best qualified to form a right judgment in that particular. For Livy tells us <sup>r</sup>, that Hannibal, when asked by Scipio, who in his opinion were the greatest generals in the world, named Alexander in the first place, Pyrrhus in the second, and himself in the third (P). All the antients tell us, that no general understood the art of war better than the king of Epirus, who learnt it by principles and rules, as well as by use and experience, and is said to have wrote several volumes on encampments and the different ways of drawing up an army. These books are mentioned by Tully <sup>r</sup>; and Donatus tells us, that Pyrrhus invented a sort of game like that of chess, to re-

(P) Plutarch in his life of Pyrrhus relates this matter in a different way; his words are, Hannibal said, that of all the great commanders in the world, Pyrrhus was the first both for experience and capacity; the second place he gave to Scipio; and reserved the third for himself, as we have observed in the life of Scipio. We do not dispute what Plutarch may have said in the last mentioned work, which has not reached our times; but only observe, that in the life of Flaminius he relates the opinion of Hannibal otherwise than he does in the life of Pyrrhus. This general, (says he, in the life of Flaminius) and Scipio Africanus had an interview at Ephesus, and the conversation turning upon this question, Who were the greatest generals? Hannibal named Alexander in the first place, Pyrrhus in the second, and himself in the third. Scipio is here excluded, whereas he is the second in the life of Pyrrhus, where no mention is made of Alexander. Livy likewise gives us an account of this conference, and exactly agrees with Plutarch in the life of Flaminius (106): For according to him Hannibal gave the first place to Alexander, the second to Pyrrhus, and the third to himself; whereupon Scipio seeing himself excluded, said with a smile, And what place would you claim, if you had overcome me? Had I overcome you, replied Hannibal, I should look upon myself as superior both to Alexander and to Pyrrhus; which was implicitly owning, that Scipio had not his equal, and therefore was not to be brought into competition with other generals. The fathers Catrou and Rouille, disagreeing in this place with the antients, tell us, that Hannibal named Alexander in the first place, Pyrrhus in the second, Scipio in the third, and himself in the last (107). It is an unpardonable fault in a writer to pass his own conjectures upon the readers for matter of fact.

present the different ways of making attacks and drawing up armies in battalia <sup>c</sup>. Livy gives us the same account of Pyrrhus, or rather makes Hannibal say as much of him; he was, says that great general, the first, who perfectly understood how to encamp, chuse his ground, and post his men to advantage <sup>u</sup>. He is generally represented by the antient historians as a prince of an uncommon understanding, and of great sagacity and penetration. It is therefore surprizing, that Tully should take him to be included in the famous verses of Ennius, wherein that poet says, that the whole race of the Æacidæ were naturally stupid, and remarkable for nothing but their martial courage <sup>w</sup> (Q). Pyrrhus had, besides his military talents, many other commendable qualities, viz. a great deal of good nature, much compassion for the unhappy, and no less gratitude for those who had obliged him. When Æropus, one of his chief favourites, who had done him considerable service, died, he wept, and was heard to say, It is not his death that most afflicts me; he has paid the debt he owes to nature. My concern is, that I so long delayed making him a suitable return for his services, and by that means I am deprived of the pleasure of shewing my gratitude <sup>x</sup>. Cicero commends him even on account of his probity: two great generals, says that writer, disputed the empire of Italy with the Romans, Pyrrhus and Hannibal; the probity of the former is still remembered, and spoke of with respect in Rome; but the cruelty of the latter has rendered his name and memory odious to this city <sup>y</sup>. His only faults were ambition and inconstancy; the former did not so much proceed from an avaricious desire of enriching himself and possessing vast dominions, as from a love of glory; he had proposed Alexander the Great to himself for a model, and in all his enterprizes had no other view, but to equal and even surpass that conqueror. His inconstancy indeed was very remarkable, as is plain from what we have already said of him. He had scarce tried one enemy, when he was for engaging another; scarce undertaken one enterprize, when he was for entering upon another; so that his whole life was a continued series of new projects succeeding one another. When he had once conquered a country, he neglected all proper measures for the preserving of it, how dear soever the conquest might have cost him. Hence Antigonus used to compare him, as Plutarch informs us<sup>2</sup>, to a lucky gamester, who did not know how to make a good use of his fortune, but lavishly spent whatever he got by gaming. Some authors find fault with him, and indeed not without a great deal of reason, for exposing his person in all his battles, without the least precaution; like a common soldier. A good commander, say they, ought to pique himself upon the wisdom and prudence of his conduct, and not upon any action, which only displays strength and intrepidity. A commander who brags of his courage, and rashly exposes himself to danger, confounds his own merit and function with those of a private soldier. It is not the duty of a general to fight in the foremost ranks; but to be vigilant for the common safety of the army. Such were the sentiments of the ancients; but most of the generals and kings who flourished in the age we are now writing of, made no distinction between the duty of an officer and a soldier, being led astray by the fortunate temerity of Alexander, whom they pretended to imitate.

BUT to return to the Epirots in Argos; they no sooner heard of the death of their king, but they threw down their arms, and surrendered at discretion. But Antigonus treated them with great humanity, and generously sent them back to Epirus, together with Helenus, the king's son, who was also taken prisoner, delivering to him the body of his unfortunate father inclosed in a golden urn<sup>2</sup>. When news of Pyrrhus's death was brought to Tarentum, the inhabitants sent ambassadors to Carthage; imploring the assistance of that republic, both against the Romans and Milo, who still held the citadel with a strong garison of Epirots. The Carthaginians, desirous to get footing on the coast of Italy, sent immediately a powerful fleet to the assistance of the Tarentines, pretending, that they had no other view but to drive the Epirots out of the citadel. While the Carthaginians besieged the city by sea, the Romans under the conduct of Papyrius Cursor attacked it by land; so that Milo, being inclosed on all sides, without any hopes of relief, sent a deputation to the Roman camp, offering to surrender the citadel to Papyrius, on condition, that he would suffer him and his men to retire to Epirus with all their baggage and effects. The consul, to frustrate the Whereupon the citadel was by Milo delivered up to the Romans, as was also the city soon after by the inhabitants, who gave up their arms, their ships, and themselves, into the consul's hands, and thus put an end to their war with Rome <sup>b</sup>.

Pyrrhus was succeeded in the kingdom of Epirus by his son Alexander, who soon after his accession to the throne invaded Macedon, and there committed great depredations, while Antigonus Gonatus lay with his army before Athens.

Hereupon the king of Macedon hastened with all his forces to the defence of his own dominions. But the Macedonians deserting him, when he least expected it, and joining the enemy, he was by Alexander stript of his kingdom, and obliged to seek for shelter in Greece. Upon his retreat his son Demetrius, who was then very young, having drawn together a body of troops, engaged Alexander, defeated him in a pitched battle, and drove him not only out of Macedon, but also out of Epirus, his hereditary kingdom. Alexander being thus in his turn expelled his dominions, fled to the Acarnanians, and having raised among them fresh forces, returned into Epirus, where he was joined by such numbers of his own subjects, that Demetrius thought it adviseable to quit that kingdom, and withdraw into Macedon <sup>c</sup>. He afterwards engaged in a war with the Illyrians, and having gained over them a complete victory, passed the remainder of his reign in peace and tranquillity, without molesting his neighbours, or being molested by them <sup>d</sup>. He is celebrated by Ælian as a great commander, and said to have wrote a book on the method of drawing up an army <sup>e</sup>. Athenæus <sup>f</sup> tells us, that in this king's reign a certain kind of beans blossomed in a lake of Epirus, and for two years together brought their fruit to perfection; which seeming very strange to Alexander, he placed a guard upon them, with orders to let no one gather them, or even approach the lake. He no sooner took this precaution, but the stalks of the beans withered, and the lake suddenly grew dry (R). Alexander left by his sister Olympias, whom he had had married, a son and a daughter. His daughter, by name Phthia, married Demetrius II. king of Macedon. His son, named Ptolemy, succeeded him in the kingdom, under the tuition of his mother Olympias, he 'being very young at his father's death. He was a prince of great expectation, but died when he was scarce out of his minority, as he was leading his army against the Ætolians, who had seized that part of Acarmania which belonged to the crown of Pyrrhus Epirus <sup>2</sup>. He left one son, by name Pyrrhus, who, after a short reign under the guardianship of his grandmother Olympias, was treacherously murdered by the Ambracians, leaving behind him one daughter, called by Justin, Laudamia, by Pausanias, Athenæus, and Polyænus, Deidamia. This princess succeeded her father; but the Epirots, disdaining to live under the government of a woman, suborned Nestor, one of her guards, to murder her; but the assassin's heart failing in the attempt, the unhappy Deidamia fled for refuge to the temple of Diana, where she was barbarously assassinated by one Milo, who being sentenced to death for the murder of his own mother Philotera, redeemed himself from the punishment due to his wickedness by murdering his sovereign <sup>3</sup>. But he did not long enjoy the fruit of his crime; for being seized with madness, he laid violent hands on himself twelve days after the death of Deidamia. As for the Epirots, they were severely punished by heaven, first with a dreadful famine, and afterwards with domestic troubles, foreign wars, and many other calamities; which reduced their country to the last extremity. the Epirot garison, which Pyrrhus left at Locris, when he set out on his expedition into Sicily. For we don't see him appear, say they, with his brothers in the last adventures of the king their father. He does not appear, 'tis true, in the last adventures of his father; but had the good fathers remembered what they must have read in Plutarch's life of Pyrrhus, they would have inferred from thence, that he had been sent back into Epirus; for he was there when his father was killed, as is manifest from the above-mentioned writer, who tells us, that Antigonus delivered to Heleneus the body of his father inclosed in a golden urn, desiring him to carry it into Epirus to his brother Alexander. The same prince is mentioned, as succeeding his father in the kingdom of Epirus, by Justin, Pausanias, Frontinus, Valerius Maximus, and Athenæus, who give us a particular account of his wars with Antigonas Gonatus, with his son Demetrius, and also with the Illyrians.

count we read in Polyænus <sup>h</sup>: but Pausanias tells us, that Deidamia, after a short and peaceable reign, died quietly in her bed, leaving the Epirots, as she had no issue, free to chuse what sort of government they liked best <sup>i</sup>. But however that be, it is certain, (for in this the ancients are unanimous) that in this princess ended the family of the Pyrrhidæ, or the descendants of Pyrrhus Neoptolemus, and that upon her death the Epirots formed themselves into a republic, which was governed by annual magistrates, or prætors, chosen in the general assembly of the whole nation: Of this republic we have already given a distinct account in our history of Greece from the time it was first formed, till it was reduced by the Romans to a province <sup>k</sup>. We shall only observe here, that the Macedonians on one side, and the Illyrians on the other, taking advantage of the intestine divisions, which, generally speaking, attend a popular government, seized on several provinces belonging to the Epirots, and annexed them to their respective crowns; and hence it is, that though the kingdom of Epirus made a considerable figure, the republic scarce made any. Aristotle, as Stephanus informs us, wrote a particular book on the polity of the Epirots; whence we may infer, that they were governed by excellent laws; but as that work has not reached our times, we can give no account of them. Plutarch tells us, that the Epirots enjoyed a kind of liberty; and indeed the best sort of liberty, under their kings; for according to him, a general assembly of the people was yearly convened at Passaron, a city in the province of Molossis, where the king bound himself by a solemn oath to govern agreeable to the laws, and the people to obey and support him as long as he did so. Their form of government was, it seems, of the same nature with ours, and therefore far preferable to any other. But it is now time to dismiss this subject, and pass to the history of other kingdoms.

The History of BITHYNIA.

THIS country anciently known by the names of Names, si-
Mysia, Mygdonia, Bebrycia, Mariandynia and Bi- tuation, thynia, was bounded on the west by Bosporus Thra- &c.

the river Rhyndacus and mount Olympus; on the north by the
lemy extends the confines of Bithynia on this side to Citorum on the coast, and to Juliopolis in the inland country, comprehending under the name of Bithynia some provinces belonging, according to other geographers, to Galatia and Paphlagonia.

THE chief cities of Bithynia on the coast were, Myr- Cities.

dacus. This city was so called from Myrlus of Colophon its founder, as Stephanus informs us, or, as others will have it, from Myrlea a celebrated Amazon, who either founded or embellished it. It was demolished by Philip of Ma- cedon the father of Perses, and rebuilt by Prusias king of Bithynia, who from his wife called it Apamea<sup>m</sup>. It was afterwards honoured with the title of a Roman colony, many Romans who had served in Asia having settled there, as Strabo and Pliny<sup>n</sup> inform us: but the latter was certainly mistaken, when he placed this among the inland cities. Dascy-

was founded <sup>a</sup>. All the ancients speak of it as a place of great note. Pliny calls it a famous and beautiful city <sup>r</sup>; Ammianus Marcellinus, the mother of all the cities of Bithynia <sup>s</sup>; Pausanias the greatest and first city of Bithynia <sup>t</sup>; Libanus compares it to Rome, Byzantium, Alexandria, and Antioch, at that time the four greatest cities of the world; and says, that though it was perhaps inferior to them in bigness, it equalled them all in beauty. This author lived in the time of the emperor Julian the Apostate. Pausanias, Marcellinus <sup>u</sup>, and Trebellius Pollio <sup>w</sup> tell us, that this city was formerly called Astacus. Stephanus will have its ancient name to have been Olbia. But Nicomedia, Astacus, and Olbia, are spoke of by Ptolemy as three neighbouring, but distinct cities. Strabo writes, that Nicomedes destroyed Astacus, and transferred its inhabitants to Nicomedia <sup>x</sup>. In this city the Roman emperors resided, when the affairs of the empire called them in to the east. Constantine the Great chose Nicomedia, as we read in Nicephorus <sup>y</sup>, for the place of his abode after he retired from Rome, and there remained till the buildings he had begun at Byzantium were finished. This city, once so famous, is now but a small village known to the Turks by the name of Schemith. Pronectus, a colony of the Phœnicians, as Stephanus informs us; Drepanum or Drepane, spoke of by Livy, Florus, and most of the Latin historians. All these cities stood on the Propontis, now the sea of Marmora. On the Bosphorus, which parts Europe from Asia, and joins the Propontis with the Euxine sea, stood the famous city of Chalcedon or Calcedon, antiently known by the names of Procerastis and Colbusa. Pliny <sup>z</sup>, Strabo <sup>a</sup>, and Tacitus <sup>b</sup>, call it the city of the blind, alluding without all doubt, to the answer which the Pythian Apollo gave to the founders of Byzantium, who, consulting the oracle about a place where to build a city, were directed to chuse that spot which lay opposite to the habitation of the blind; that is, as was then understood, to Chalcedon, the Chalcedonians well deserving that epithet, for having built their city in a barren and sandy soil without seeing that advantageous and pleasant spot on the opposite shore, which the Byzantines afterwards chose. Constantine the Great, if Cedrenus is to be credited, had been guilty of the like oversight, had he not been warned by an astonishing prodigy. For that author tells us, that Chalcedon being destroyed by the Persians, Constantine undertook the rebuilding of it with a design to settle there; but that several eagles, appearing unexpectedly, carried away in their talons the lines of the workmen, and let them drop at Byzantium. This miracle, which was several times repeated, made Constantine alter his mind, and prefer Byzantium to Chalcedon<sup>c</sup>. But what credit Cedrenus deserves, we leave our readers to judge. Chalcedon in the christian times became famous on account of the council which was held there against Eutyches. The emperor Valens caused the walls of this city to be levelled with the ground for siding with Procopius, and the materials to be conveyed to Constantinople, where they were employed in building the famous Valentinian aqueduct. The Pelamides, or tunny-fish, of Chalcedon were in great request among the ancients, as Gellius and Varro inform us<sup>d</sup>, and are to this day thought by some to have a better flavour than any taken elsewhere. It is therefore surprizing, that Pliny and Strabo<sup>e</sup> should tell us, that this kind of fish never came near Chalcedon, but kept close to the opposite shore of Byzantium, for fear of the white rocks concealed under water on the coast of Asia. Chalcedon is at present a poor beggarly place known to the Greeks by its antient name, and to the Turks by that of Cadiaci; or the Judges town<sup>f</sup>.

ON the Euxine sea stood the city of Heraclea, once a re- Heraclea. public of no small note. It is commonly called Pontica, or Heraclea on the Pontus, to distinguish it from several other cities of the same name. Pausanias<sup>g</sup> and the scholiast of Apollonius<sup>h</sup> tell us, that it was founded and peopled by a colony of the Megarenses and Tanagræi of Bæotia. With them Justin agrees, and acquaints us on what occasion the Bæotians undertook the building of this city. The Bæotians, says he, being reduced to great straits by a plague, had recourse to the oracle of Delphos, which enjoined them to send a colony into the country bordering on the Pontus, and there build a city in honour of Hercules. But the Bæotians chusing rather to die in their own country, than expose themselves to the dangers of so troublesome a voyage, refused to comply with the injunctions of the oracle. Whereupon the Phocenses invading their country, and committing everywhere dreadful ravages, as they were not, by reason of the plague which still raged among them, in a condition to defend themselves, they sent anew to consult the oracle, which returned the following answer ; viz. that what would put an end to the plague, would likewise put an end to the war. By this answer the Bæotians understood that the only means to redeem themselves from the calamities they groaned under was to follow the direction of the oracle ; and accordingly sent a colony into the country bordering on the Pantus, which settled on the coast, and built the city of Heraclea<sup>1</sup>. This city in process of time acquired such wealth and power, especially by sea, that it was not inferior to any of the Greek states in Asia. Xenophon tells us, that in his time the Heracleans had a numerous fleet, and that they supplied him with a squadron to convoy his men after their retreat into Greece. There are scarce any wars mentioned by the antients as carried on by sea in those parts, in which the Heracleans were not concerned, their friendship being courted by all the princes of Asia in regard of their maritime power. To them chiefly Ptolemy Ceraunus was indebted for the signal victory he had gained at sea over Antigonus Gonatus ; for they sent him a numerous squadron of ships well manned and equipped, among which some were of an extraordinary size, especially one, called the Leontifera, having on each side eight hundred rowers, besides twelve hundred fighting men on board under the command of two experienced officers<sup>k</sup>. In the war which Antiochus waged first with Antigonus the son of Demetrius, and afterwards with the Byzantines, the Heracleans assisted the former against Antiochus with thirteen gallies, and the latter with forty<sup>l</sup>. They maintained for the space of eleven years a squadron of gallies in the service of the Romans, which were of great use to them in their wars with the Asiatic princes, and likewise against the Maruccini, a people of Africa. Many other instances are to be met with in history, which shew that Heraclea was once one of the most powerful states, at least by sea, in Asia. The Heracleans seem to have maintained a good understanding with the kings of Persia ; and on that account refused, as Justin informs us<sup>m</sup>, to pay their quota, when the Athenians imposed a tribute on the Greek cities of Asia Minor, for the equipping and supporting of a fleet to be employed in the defence of the common liberty. Upon their refusal Lamachus was sent against them ; but while he was ravaging their country with the troops he had landed, a violent storm shattered his whole fleet, so that he saw himself abandoned to the mercy of those he had provoked, not being in a condition to return to Athens either by sea or land. But the Heracleans, instead of treating him like an enemy, as he had reason to expect, used both him and his troops with the greatest humanity and kindness, supplying them not only with provisions, but also with ships to convey them safe into Greece. They did not complain, says Justin <sup>n</sup>, of the depredations committed in their territory, but looked upon them as highly advantageous to their state, since they offered them an opportunity of gaining by civilities the friendship of so powerful a republic.

As to their form of government, it was, as we read in Form of Aristotle <sup>o</sup>, originally democratical; but democracy soon gave way to aristocracy; for the same writer tells us <sup>p</sup>, that many of the nobles being sent out to lead colonies into distant countries, the people, in whom the supreme power was lodged, began to oppress those who still remained; whereupon they ran to arms in their own defence, and having got the better of their adversaries, took the whole power into their own hands. Soon after new disturbances arising among the nobles, by reason that the most wealthy engrossed the whole management of affairs to themselves, it was agreed, that the supreme power should be lodged in the senate, and that the senate should consist of six hundred members all chosen out of the nobility. This new regulation incensed the common people to such a degree, that with one consent they rose against the nobles, and reduced them to such straits, that they were obliged to implore the assistance first of Timotheus the Athenian, and afterwards of Epaminondas the Theban. But neither of these generals caring to interfere with their domestic quarrels, they were forced to recal Clearchus, a senator, whom they themselves had banished. But as his banishment had neither improved his morals, nor inspired him with better principles, he made the troubles, in which he found the city involved, subservient to his wicked design of subjecting it, and usurping the sovereign power. With this view he openly declared for the people, and having by their means humbled the nobles, he caused himself to be invested with the whole power, which had been divided among them. Being thus become absolute, he exercised all sorts of cruelty upon such as gave him any umbrage: most of the senators were either barbarously assassinated, or stripped of their estates,

His cruel-ty. and banished their native country *. Diodorus Siculus tells us, that he proposed to himself Dionysius, tyrant of Syracuse, for his model in the art of government †. The banished senators having stirred up the neighbouring cities against him, he compelled their wives and daughters to marry his slaves, and with the assistance of these having vanquished the troops they led against him, and taken many of them prisoners, he put them all to death after he had made them suffer the most exquisite torments, which his cruel temper and an eager desire of revenge could invent. Theopompus of Scio tells us, that he frequently obliged, without any provocation, such of the citizens as came to wait on him, and even those he met in the streets, to drink a cup of the poisonous juice of hemlock, and that during his reign, no citizen of any distinction dared venture out of his house till he had armed himself with rue, which is a powerful antidote, according to that writer, against the juice of hemlock, when taken before any other food ‡. Clearchus, after he had exercised a most cruel tyranny over his fellow-citizens for the space of twelve years, Is murdered. was at last put to death by Chion and Leonides, two young citizens and disciples of Plato §. Nymphis of Heraclea, as quoted by Athenæus ¶, tells us, that Clearchus, though he affected to be a god, and caused divine honours to be paid him, yet towards the end of his life was so apprehensive of conspiracies, that he not only kept at home, but gave audience shut up in a strong chest, answering those who applied to him, through holes made for that purpose. But as he was murdered by the conspirators, according to Plutarch || and Diodorus Siculus **, while he was administering justice in public, we can hardly give credit to Nymphis.

THE conspirators delivered their country from the tyrant; but the tyranny still subsisted. For Clearchus having left two sons, Timotheus and Dionysius, their uncle Satyrus seized on the sovereign power, as their guardian and protector, and equalled his brother Clearchus in the tyranny of his government. For he not only put to death the conspirators, their children, and all those who were any ways related to them, but likewise such of the citizens as he imagined capable of following their example. After the death of Alexander he married Amastris, the widow of Craterus, and daughter of Oxiathres the brother of Darius. Upon this marriage he assumed the title of king, and maintained it with great dignity, being a prince of a mild temper, and always ready to sacrifice his own ease and private interest to the welfare of his subjects. Ælian ‡ and Athenæus § tell us, that he grew immoderately corpulent, and fell into a kind of lethargy, from which his domestics could scarce recover him by running long needles, made for that purpose, into his flesh. He died in the fifty-fifth year of his age, and twenty-third of his reign, and is highly commended by all the antients on account of his justice, moderation, good-nature, affability, and other princely qualities. Strabo no doubt had this prince and his brother Timotheus in view, when he wrote, that Heraclea had been governed by tyrants, and also by kings. He left two sons by his wife Amastris, viz. Clearchus and Oxatres, whom Diodorus Siculus calls Zathras. Upon his death Amastris married Lyfimachus, one of Alexander's captains, who by that means got possession of Heraclea, which she governed as guardian to her children ; for they were both very young when their father died. Lyfimachus afterwards divorced Amastris to marry Arfinoe the daughter of Ptolemy Philadelphus, king of Egypt ; but nevertheless kept possession of the city, and brought up the two young princes with great care. They both attended him in his expedition against the Getæ, after which he suffered them to return home, and resigned the government of Heraclea to Clearchus the eldest, allowing him to take upon him the title of king. With this title he governed Heraclea, according to Diodorus Siculus, seventeen years, and was at last put to death by Lyfimachus, with his brother Oxatres, for assassinating their mother Amastris ¶ ;

for they both conspired against her, and caused her to be smothered, while she was going by sea from Heraclea to Anastria, a city which she had built, and called by her own name. Upon their death Lyfimachus restored the Heracleans to the full enjoyment of their antient liberties. But they did not long continue in that happy condition, Arsinoe, who had a great ascendant over her husband Lyfimachus, having prevailed upon him to deprive them of the liberty which he had not long before granted them, and appoint one Heraclitus Cimeterius governor of the place, a man intirely at her devotion. After the famous battle of Coroupedion, in which Lyfimachus was killed by one Malakon, a native of Heraclea, the Heracleans conspired to shake off the yoke, under which they had groaned for the space of seventy-five years, determined either to recover their former liberty, or die in the attempt. With this resolution the chief citizens went in a body to wait on Heraclitus, intreating him to retire of his own accord, and suffer them to live according to their own laws. They offered him all possible security for his person and effects, and besides a large sum of money to defray the charges of his journey. At this proposal Heraclitus in a great rage commanded the officers, who attended him, to put immediately to death some of the leading men whom he named. But the officers, to his great surprize, instead of obeying his orders, seized him, and carried him to the public prison. For the Heracleans had beforehand gained them over to their party, by making them free of Heraclea, and promising to pay them the arrears which were due to them from Heraclitus. Having thus secured the tyrant, they demolished the citadel which Lyfimachus had built, raised one of their own citizens, by name Phocrites, to the chief magistracy, and dispatched an embassy to Seleucus king of Syria, to acquaint him with what they had done, and implore his protection. Seleucus had been greatly prejudiced against the Heracleans by one Aphrodisius, who being sent by him to visit the cities of Asia, had laid many things to their charge, and represented them as disaffected to his person. He was therefore so far from promising them his protection, that he threatened their ambassadors, and let drop some expressions, which gave just grounds to suspect that he had some design upon their city. Hereupon the Heracleans entered into an offensive and defensive league with Mithridates king of Pontus; the Byzantines and Chalcedonians recalled all their exiles, and put themselves in a posture of defence. But the death of Seleucus soon delivered them from their apprehensions <sup>d</sup>. From this time the Heracleans enjoyed their liberties undisturbed for many years. When the Romans became formidable in Asia, they made an alliance with them, the articles of which were engraved on tables of brass, and lodged at Rome in the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus, and at Heraclea in a temple of the same god. Notwithstanding this alliance, the Heracleans suffered greatly by the wars which they engaged in for the defence of their liberties, against the Bithynians and Galatians. However, they held out against their utmost efforts, and obliged them to withdraw their forces with disgrace. In the war which the Romans waged with Mithridates the Great, they resolved at first to observe a strict neutrality, and accordingly refused to admit that prince's fleet into their harbour. But, on the approach of his general Archelaus, they thought fit to change their measures, and side with him, after having murdered all the Romans who resided among them. Their treachery cost them dear; for Cotta, or rather Triarius, having after a two year's siege taken their city, pillaged and reduced it to ashes, as we have related in the history of Pontus <sup>e</sup>. Cotta, on his return to Rome, was severely reprimanded by the senate for suffering so great and wealthy a city to be destroyed. We gave you orders, said the senate, to take Heraclea, but not to destroy it. All the captives were sent home without ransom, and the inhabitants restored to the possession of their lands, and allowed the use of their harbour, and the freedom of commerce. Britagoras, one of the chief citizens, spared no pains to repeople it; but could not obtain for his fellow-citizens the restitution of their liberty and antient privileges. Strabo tells us, that many of the citizens being killed during the siege, and more after the place was taken, a numerous colony was sent from Rome to repeople it. Some of the new comers settled in the city, and some in the country; but the former were all to a man massacred by Adioterix, the son of Demeneceus, king of the Galatians, not without the privity, as was then suspected, of Marc Antony the triumvir, who had bestowed on the Galatians that quarter of the city which was inhabited by the Romans <sup>f</sup>. But his cruelty did not go long unpunished; for Octavianus having taken him prisoner after the famous battle of Actium, carried him in chains to Rome to grace his triumph, and afterwards caused both him and his son to be put to death. time Heraclea continued subject to the Roman emperors till the downfall of the empire, being with its territory made part of the province of Pontus. It did not lose its antient splendor even after the loss of its liberty, as appears from some antient inscriptions, and also medals, which have reached us, and were struck under the emperors<sup>g</sup>. Near this city was the famous cave, through which Hercules is feigned to have descended to the infernal regions, and brought up from thence the fabulous Cerberus. This cave was still to be seen in Xenophon's time; but is now quite closed up, tho' once two furlongs deep<sup>h</sup>. The antient history of Heraclea was wrote by Pisander, Timagenes, Panyasis, Domitius, Callistus, Cynæthon, Nymphis, and Memnon; for to these Athenæus, Suidas, Stephanus, and the scholiast of Apollonius, refer us for a more full account of what they briefly relate of the Heracleans. But the works of these authors have been long since lost, nothing now remaining of them but an extract of Memnon preserved by Photius in his Bibliothèque; and from him we have in great part copied what we have said here of Heraclea. This city is at present a very inconsiderable place, known to the Greeks by the name of Pendrachi, and to the Turks by that of Eregri. We cannot, with a modern traveller, take either of these names to be a corruption of Heraclea Pontica, or Heraclea<sup>i</sup>.

The inland cities of Bithynia.

THE inland cities of Bithynia, which it may be proper to take notice of, were, Prusæ at the foot of mount Olympus, built, according to Strabo<sup>k</sup>, by Prusias king of Bithynia, who waged war with Cræsus and Cyrus, and not by Hannibal, as Pliny<sup>l</sup> would make us believe. Nay, this city must have been founded long before the times of Cræsus and Cyrus, if the tradition be true, which the inhabitants have transmitted to us in several medals, viz. that Ajax stabbed himself here with his sword. 'Tis surprizing, that Livy, who has so well described the neighbourhood of mount Olympus, where the Gauls were defeated by Manlius, should not mention this place. Prusæ was the place where the Othoman princes resided before they extended their conquests into Europe, and is still one of the most beautiful and populous cities of Asia. We must not, with some geographers, confound the city of Prusæ with that of Prusias, of which we have spoke above. Libyssa, famous for the death of Hannibal, and the tomb of that great commander, which was still extant in Pliny's time <sup>m</sup>. Some writers place Libyssa on the coast, but Strabo, and with him Stephanus, and most of the antients, count it among the inland cities. Cellarius conjectures, that it stood three or four miles distance from the sea, and was on that account called by some a maritime, by others an inland city, or rather castle. Nicæa, or Nice, which stood on the lake Ascanius, now the lake of Isnich. This city was built, according to Strabo, who calls it the metropolis of Bithynia <sup>n</sup>, by Antigonus the son of Philip of Macedon, and from him called at first Antigonia. Afterwards it was repaired and embellished by Lyfimachus, who gave it the name of his wife Nicæa, the daughter of Antipater. Stephanus tells us, that Nicæa was originally a colony of the Bottiæi, a people of Thrace, and called in the earliest times Anchore. Pliny speaks of two cities in Bithynia bearing this name, the one he places twenty five miles east of Prusa, now Bursa; the other forty four north of Nicomedia on the lake Ascanius. But Strabo, Ptolemy, Stephanus, Mela, &c. speak of one city only in Bithynia bearing that name (S), which they place on the lake Ascanius lying to the north of mount Olympus,

(S) The reverend fathers Catrou and Rouille in their description of Nice, tell us (110) that the antient geographers place it on the lake Ascanius, which, say they, is now called the lake of Isnich; and, a few lines after, question, whether there ever was a lake of that name, thinking it very natural to suppose, that Pliny, the only author, say they, who mentions it, by the lake Ascanius meant the gulf of Olbia, now the gulf of Nicomedia. If the antient geographers place Nice, as they say, on the lake Ascanius, Pliny is not the only author who mentions such a lake; and if it be true, that the lake Ascanius is by the modern geographers called the lake of Isnich, how can we doubt whether there ever was a lake of that name? Besides, it is so far from being natural to suppose Pliny to have meant the gulf of Olbia by the lake Ascanius, that his words evidently destroy such a supposition; for in the very passage, which the above-mentioned writers quote, Pliny distinguishes the lake Ascanius from the gulf, on which he places the antient city of Olbia (111). Lastly, Pliny is not the only author who makes mention of the lake Ascanius. Strabo tells us in express terms (112), that Nicæa, the metropolis of Bithynia, stood on the lake Ascanius; and Ptolemy speaks of it as falling into the Euxine sea, between Prusias and the promontory Posidium.

and at a small distance from the river Gallus. Nicæa, according to Strabo, stood in a large and fruitful plain, was sixteen furlongs in compass, well peopled, and in the Roman times declared the metropolis of the second Bithynia, Nicomedia being the capital of the first. For Pontus and Bithynia were by Augustus made one province, but by his successors divided into two, called the first and second Bithynia. The first general council held here, by the appointment of Constantine the Great, against Arius, gave new lustre to this city; for it was ever after honoured with the title and privileges of a metropolis, as appears from the acts of the council of Chalcedon.

Rivers.

THE chief rivers of Bithynia were the Psillis, Golpas, Sangarius, or Sagaris, Hypius, Rhebas, and the Lycus, all discharging themselves into the Euxine sea between Chalcedon and Heraclea. Livy was certainly mistaken when he wrote that the Sangarius, the chief river of Bithynia, falls into the Propontis. It springs from mount Dindymus, in Phrygia, at a small distance from a town, which Strabo calls Sangia; waters Phrygia and Bithynia, and receiving in its course the Thymbrus and the Gallus, falls into the Euxine sea over-against the small island of Thynias. Some geographers place the river Parthenius in Bithynia; but these extend the bounds of this country a great way into Paphlagonia. As Bithynia lies between the forty-first and forty-third degrees of north latitude, and is watered by a great many rivers, it once abounded with all the necessaries of life. The antients compare some of the inland provinces to the fruitful and delicious vales of Tempe itself; but at present it lies in great part neglected and unmanured.

Inhabitants.

Bithynia was antiently inhabited by various nations, differing in their manners, customs, and language, namely the Bebryces, the Mariandyni, the Caucones, the Dolliones, the Cimmerii, &c. But to inquire into the origin of these different nations would be both a tedious and useless task. Xenophon<sup>o</sup> and Strabo<sup>p</sup> are of opinion, that the Bithynians and the Mariandyni were originally Thracians, who, crossing the Bosphorus, made themselves masters of this country, which from them was antiently called the Asiatic Thrace. Some modern writers derive them from Ashkenaz, one of Gomer's sons; but the only proof they alledge to support their opinion is, the small likeness they discover between Ashkenaz and Aseanius, the name of a lake in this country. Stephanus says, that the

Mariandyni were so called from one Mariandynus, a native of Æolis, who, with some of his countrymen, settled in that part of Bithynia, which lies between the rivers Hypius and Parthenius <sup>9</sup>. Theopompus, as quoted by Strabo <sup>r</sup>, will have this Mariandynus to have been a petty king of Paphlagonia, and to have subdued that part of Bithynia, then called Bebrycia, which bordered on his dominions. These different nations were antiently governed by kings of their own, Bithynia being, in the earliest times, divided into as many kingdoms as nations or tribes. For Plutarch, Polyænus, and Stephanus, mention Mandron and Bysnus as reigning over the Bebryces; and Hyginus speaks of one Lycus king of the Mariandyni. But all we know of these small kingdoms, and the princes, who ruled over them, is, that in process of time they were reduced by the more powerful kings of the Bithynians. But as to the beginning of this kingdom, we are quite in the dark. Diodorus Siculus pretends, that the Bithynians were governed by their own princes in the time of Ninus king of Assyria, who, according to him, subdued their country. Pherecydes, as quoted by the scholiast of Apollo-nius, mentions Amycus and Phyneus as reigning in Bithynia at the time of the Argonautic expedition; and Appian tells us, that nine and forty kings had reigned in Bithynia before the Romans were acquainted with Asia. If what these authors write be true, the kingdom of Bithynia must have been erected before the Trojan war; which we can hardly believe, since Homer, who is so exact in enumerating the nations in the neighbourhood of Troas, never once mentions the Bithynians. From his silence some have concluded, that Bithynia was uninhabited in the time of the Trojan war, and add, that the Thracians, who marched with Rhesus to the relief of Troy, after the death of their king and the taking of the city, settled in that part of Asia, which was afterwards known by the name of Bithynia. This name, say they, the newcomers gave to the provinces, in which they settled, from the Bithyas, a river in their own country. Strabo <sup>r</sup> speaks of one Prusias reigning in Bithynia in the time of Cræsus, the last king of Lydia, by whom he was conquered. From this time the Bithynians continued subject first to the Lydians, and afterwards to the Persians, till the reign of Alexander the Great; for we find them mentioned by Herodotus among the many nations that attended Xerxes in his expedition into Greece. While they were subject to the Persians, they were

Some writers place in the reign of Dædalſus the invaſion of the Byzantines, Chalcedonians, and Thracians, who, entering Bithynia, committed there, as Diodorus Siculus informs us<sup>c</sup>, moſt dreadful ravages ; and, having taken ſeveral towns, made a great many captives, whom they inhumanly murdered, when they found themſelves obliged to leave the country. Boteras was, according to Memnon, the ſon of Dædalſus, and died in the ſeventy ſixth year of his age. He was ſucceeded by his ſon Bas, who, having overcome Calantus, one of Alexander the Great's generals, peaceably enjoyed the kingdom of Bithynia for the ſpace of fifty years, and died in the ſeventy firſt of his age<sup>d</sup>.

Bas was ſucceeded by Zipætes, who waged war firſt with the Heracleans, and afterwards with the Chalcedonians. Over the former he gained no conſiderable advantage, but reduced the latter to great ſtraits, beſieged their metropolis, and, having drawn them to a battle, killed eight thouſand of them on the ſpot<sup>e</sup>. He was prevented from purſuing the victory, which would have ſoon put him in poſſeſſion of Chalcedon, by Patrocles, one of Antiochus Soter's generals; who, entering Bithynia, put all to fire and ſword. Zipætes marched againſt him, and, having concealed his men in an ambuſh, fell upon him unexpectedly, and cut him off with his whole army, as we have related in the hiſtory of Syria<sup>f</sup>. Zipætes was ſo overjoyed at this victory, that he died ſoon after in the ſeventy ſixth year of his age, and forty eighth of his reign<sup>g</sup>. He left four ſons, of which the eldeſt, called Nicomedes, took poſſeſſion of the throne, and cauſed, out of jealouſy, two of his brothers to be put to death. But the the youngeſt, called by Memnon Zipætes, by Livy<sup>h</sup> Zibæas, having ſaved himſelf by a timely flight, ſeized on the coaſt of Bithynia, which was then known by the names of Thracia, Thyniacia, and Thracia Aſiatica, and there maintained a long war with his brother ; who, being informed that Antiochus Soter, king of Syria, was making great preparations to attack him at the ſame time, becauſe he had declared for Antigonus Gonatus, called in the Gauls to his aſſiſtance ; and on this occaſion it was that this people firſt paſſed over into Aſia. were,

were, 1. That they should ever maintain a strict friendship with Nicomedes and his successors in the kingdom of Bithynia: 2. That they should not, without his privity and consent, lend assistance to any other prince or state: 3. That they should at the same time enter into an alliance with the Tiansians, Heracleans, Chalcedonians, and Cierians; for these states had assisted Nicomedes against his brother Zipætes<sup>a</sup>. Upon these terms the Gauls passed over into Asia in the third year of the hundred and twenty fifth olympiad, as we read in Pausanias<sup>b</sup>, Nicomedes having with their assistance repulsed Antiochus, overcome his brother, and acquired the possession of all his father's dominions, bestowed upon them that part of Asia Minor which was called from them Gallo-Græcia, and Galatia. As for Zipætes, he died in banishment, his army being routed by the Gauls, and the cities, which he possessed on the coast, obliged to submit to the conqueror. Livy<sup>c</sup> and Justin<sup>d</sup> tell us, that the Gauls, having laid waste the dominions of Zipætes, kept the spoils for themselves, but divided the country with Nicomedes, calling their portion Gallo-Græcia; and herein they agree with Demetrius Byzantius, who informs us, that Gallo-Græcia was not given by Nicomedes to the Gauls, but held by them against his will after they had driven out his brother Zipætes<sup>e</sup>. Demetrius Byzantius wrote thirteen books on the migration of the Gauls out of Europe into Asia; but none of them have reached our times. Nicomedes having no enemies to contend with after the defeat of his brother, and the advantages gained over the king of Syria, applied himself to the enlarging and embellishing of the city of Astacus, which he called after his own name Nicomedia. This is what we read in Pausanias<sup>f</sup>, Trebellius Pollio<sup>g</sup>, Ammianus Marcellinus<sup>h</sup>, and Eusebius<sup>i</sup>. But Memnon says, that he built Nicomedia over-against the city of Astacus; so that Nicomedia and Astacus were according to this writer<sup>k</sup>, two distinct cities. Nicomedes had two wives, viz. Ditizele and Etazeta, the former brought him two sons, Zela and Prusias, and one daughter by name Lysandra; by the latter he had one son named Tibites, to whom, at the instigation of his mother Etazeta, he left the kingdom. But Tibites. Zela, who at the time of his fathers's death was in Armenia, Zela.

whither he had been banished by the intrigues of his step-mother, having hired an army of Galatians, returned into Bithynia, drove out Tibites, and peaceably enjoyed the crown till his death. He was taken in a snare which he had laid for the Galatians; for suspecting their fidelity, he invited their leading men to a banquet with a design to cut them all off; but they, upon private intelligence of what was preparing against them, were before-hand with the treacherous prince, murdering him in the beginning of the banquet<sup>1</sup>.

Prusias.

HE was succeeded by his son Prusias, surnamed Cholos, or the lame, and also Cunegas, or the hunter. This prince in the very beginning of his reign entered into an alliance with the Rhodians against the Byzantines, whom he reduced to great straits, as we have related at length in the history of Rhodes<sup>m</sup>. Not long after he engaged in a war with the Galatians, whom Attalus I. king of Pergamus had invited over into Asia, defeated them in a pitched battle, took several of their strong holds, and put all the Galatians he could get into his power to the sword without distinction of sex or age. When the war broke out between Antiochus the Great and the Romans, he was solicited by the former to join him against those powerful republicans; but Scipio by a letter, and Livius, admiral of the Roman fleet, by the promises he made him in the name of the republic, fixed him in the interest of Rome, as the reader will find in the history of Syria<sup>n</sup>. But notwithstanding his engagements with the Romans, he invaded the territories of Eumenes their constant friend and ally, being induced thereto by Hannibal, who had taken refuge in his dominions. The advantages he gained over Eumenes in this war were chiefly owing to Hannibal, who not only prevailed upon Ortygon, one of the kings of the Galatians, and Philip king of Macedon, to send him powerful supplies, but took upon him the command of his forces, and in several encounters put the king of Pergamus to flight by some stratagem or other<sup>o</sup>. This awakened the jealousy of the Romans, who thereupon sent T. Flaminius, Scipio Africanus, and Scipio Nasica into Asia to adjust the differences between the two kings, and to persuade Prusias to deliver Hannibal up to them<sup>p</sup>. On their arrival at the court of Bithynia, Hannibal retired to Libyssa, a strong castle, which he had been allowed by Prusias to repair in such manner as best suited the state of his affairs.

He had dug several private ways under ground, which led from his lodgings to so many different issues, through which he could make his escape either by sea or land upon the first alarm; for he had reason to suspect that the king's inclinations might change with his interest. Flaminius after having proposed a plan of accommodation between Prusias and Eumenes, acquainted the former, that Rome would never look upon him as a sincere friend unless he delivered up Hannibal, that irreconcilable enemy to their republic, who made no other use of his liberty and talents, but to draw kings and nations into the same dangerous enterprizes which had proved his ruin. Prusias refused at first to comply with the request of the ambassadors, pleading in excuse the laws of hospitality, and the age of Hannibal, which was too great for him to give any farther umbrage to the Roman senate. He also insisted on the reputation of that great general, whom he could not deliver up without drawing upon himself the indignation of all ages. But Flaminius threatening to treat him as an enemy if he persisted in favouring and protecting one who had sworn an eternal hatred to Rome, the king thought it adviseable to sacrifice his guest to the revenge of the republic, and his own interest. But Hannibal, without hesitating a moment between death and captivity, disappointed the designs of his enemies in a manner worthy of his great courage<sup>9</sup>, as we have related in the history of Pergamus.

Prusias having by thus abandoning his guest and ally to the revengeful temper of the Romans, gained their protection, in order to engage them still more in his favour, assisted them both with men and money in their war with Perses, king of Macedon; and upon the reduction of that country was not content, like the other princes of the east, with sending an embassy to Rome, to congratulate the senate on the success of their arms; but went thither in person, and dishonoured the royal dignity with his mean and servile flatteries. The senate no sooner heard of his arrival in Italy, but they sent Lucius Cornelius Scipio the son of Scipio Asiaticus, as far as Capua to meet him, with orders to defray his charges and conduct him to the capitol. Before he entered the city, he caused his head to be shaved, and took the pileus, or cap which slaves wore after they had obtained their freedom, and in that odd dress advanced towards the forum, stopped at the tribunal, where the prætors used to administer justice, and there declared with a loud voice, that he had crossed the seas, on purpose to return thanks to the Roman gods, and congratulate the republic on her late victories. His arrival being notified to the senate, they sent deputies to receive and introduce him. These Prusias received with such mean flatteries and submissions as were well suited to the attire he had assumed ; I have taken the habit and appearance of one of your freed-men, said he, and am indeed no better than a Roman slave set at liberty by your favour. The deputies were for introducing him to the senate immediately, but he desired that his audience might be put off for two days, being desirous to see first the city and temples, and visit his friends. The third day he was introduced, and on that occasion betrayed a baseness of mind unworthy of the rank and title he bore. For when he entered the senate, he kissed the threshold, saluted the senators with the titles of visible deities, saviours, deliverers, and pronounced an harangue suitable to that prelude ; in the close of which he related what he had done for the republic in the course of the war, and desired the protection of the senate both for himself and his son. After this he presented to the conscript fathers a petition, which contained two articles ; whereof the first was, that he might be allowed to offer up sacrifices in the capitol and at Prænestæ, by way of thanksgiving to Jupiter and Fortune, for the success which had attended the arms of the republic in the late war ; the second article was, that the senate would grant him a small territory, which had formerly belonged to Antiochus the Great, but was then held by the Galatians, who had seized it without the consent of the republic. The senate returned Prusias the following answer : We give the king of Bithynia leave to offer sacrifices at Rome and Prænestæ, and order that the expences of the victims and all other things for the sacrifices be defrayed by the public, in the same manner as if our own magistrates were to offer up sacrifices. As to the territory which the king desires, we shall send commissioners to judge of the affair on the spot after both parties shall have been heard. After this the senate presented him with some silver vessels, and made over to him two hundred and twenty five small ships, which had been taken from Gentius king of Illyricum. Then Prusias left Rome, embarked at Brundisium, and set sail with a squadron of twenty gallies to take possession of the fleet, which the republic had given him<sup>r</sup>. Some years after that war broke out between him and Eumenes II. which we have described in the history of Pergamus, where we have also related in what manner, and on what provocation, he was first driven from the throne, and afterwards assassinated by his own son Nicomedes <sup>t</sup>. Polybius tells us, that he was a monster rather than a man; that he had not one single virtue <sup>His death</sup> to make amends for the many vices which rendered him insupportable to his subjects, and contemptible to foreigners. <sup>and character.</sup> He was a stranger to all principles of honour or honesty, of a most cruel and savage temper, timorous, cowardly, and so addicted to pleasures of all sorts, that he seemed another Sardanapalus. His most important business was to dress himself, says our historian, to conceal the deformity of his ill-shaped and disfigured body. He was not ashamed to appear publicly in the attire of a woman, and shew his subjects a figure no less hideous than ridiculous, in a dress no-ways suited to it <sup>t</sup>. As he was himself unacquainted with the liberal arts, he despised all kinds of knowledge, discountenanced the study of philosophy, and polite literature, and carefully avoided the conversation of such persons as could form his mind, or improve his taste <sup>u</sup>. Livy, in his account of the audience which the senate gave him, takes no notice of his submissions to the senators; perhaps he thought they reflected no less dishonour on the senate, who suffered them, than on the king who acted so mean a part. But Polybius, after having given us, as it were, a specimen of the speech the slavish king made on that occasion, breaks it off abruptly, saying, that he was ashamed to repeat the expressions he made use of before that venerable assembly <sup>w</sup>. He had two wives, viz. Apame, the daughter of Dieglis, one of the kings of Thrace, who brought him two sons, Nicomedes and Prusias: The latter was surnamed Monodous, or the single-toothed, because, instead of distinct teeth, he had one continued semicircular bone in each jaw. Prusias married to his second wife the daughter of Philip king of Macedon, and had by her also children; for Justin tells us, that he intended to prefer his issue by the daughter of Philip to Nicomedes his eldest son by his first wife; and that Nicomedes, provoked at this unjust partiality, took up arms against his father, and drove him from the throne; but herein he disagrees with other writers, whom we have quoted elsewhere in our account of this revolution <sup>x</sup>.

Nicomedes II. succeeded his father, and proved a no less Nicomedes II. cruel tyrant; for he had scarce ascended the throne, when he sacrificed all his brothers to his jealousy and ambition <sup>1</sup>. He assumed the name of Epiphanes, or, the illustrious, though he performed nothing worthy of this title, or even of notice, during the whole time of his long reign. According to the accounts given us, by Strabo, Justin, and Memnon, he began to reign in the 607th year of Rome, and was still on the throne in the 649th. All we know of him, besides what we have related in the history of Pergamus, is, that he built a city, calling it by his mother's name, Apame, or Apamea. Strabo tells us <sup>2</sup>, that he was killed, but by whom, or in what manner, we find no-where recorded. Some writers conjecture, that as he had murdered his father, so he was treated in the same manner by his son Nicomedes, who on that account was by antiphrasis surnamed Philopator.

Nicomedes III.

HE was succeeded by his son Nicomedes III. who, entering into an alliance with Mithridates the Great, invaded Paphlagonia, and having seized on that country, attempted to make himself master likewise of Cappadocia, at that time subject to Mithridates, who thereupon marching into Bithynia at the head of a mighty army, drove Nicomedes from the throne, and raised his brother Socrates to it in his room. The dethroned prince had recourse to the Romans, who drove out the usurper, and restored him to his hereditary dominions. For this favour they pressed him, and at length prevailed upon him, contrary to his own inclination and the opinion of his friends, to make inroads into the territories of Mithridates, with whom Rome wanted to pick a quarrel. The king of Pontus bore for some time the devastations committed by Nicomedes with great patience, that he might not seem to be the aggressor; but at last he made him pay dear for them; for having intirely routed his army on the banks of the Amnius, he drove him a second time from the throne, and obliged him to seek for shelter in Paphlagonia, where he led a private life till the time of Sylla, who replaced him on the throne <sup>3</sup>.

Nicomedes IV.

He died not long after, and was succeeded by his son Nicomedes IV. who performed nothing which the many writers, who flourished in his time, have thought worth transmitting to posterity. His too great familiarity with Julius Cæsar, while that young Roman was making his first campaign in Asia under the prætor Thermus, gave occasion to several lampoons and severe satires, some of which were sung by the soldiery at

Cæsar's triumph over the Gauls, according to the liberty allowed them on such occasions * (T). As he died without issue male, he left his kingdom by his last will to the Romans, who reduced it to the form of a province †. Sallust, disagreeing with the antients, tells us, that Nicomedes left a son, by name Musa, or Myſa, and introduces Mithridates as complaining of the Romans to Arſaces king of Parthia, for seizing on the kingdom of Bithynia, and excluding the son of a prince, who had on all occasions shewn himself a steady friend to their republic <sup>b</sup>. But this Musa was the daughter, and not the son, of Nicomedes, as we are told in express terms by Suetonius, Velleius Paterculus, and Appian <sup>c</sup>. All we know of her is, that upon the death of her father she claimed the kingdom of Bithynia for her son as the next male heir to the crown, but without success, no motives of justice being of such weight with the ambitious Romans, as to make them part with a kingdom. Cæsar espoused her cause, and supported her claim in the senate with his usual eloquence. But as he was enumerating the many obligations he owed her father, Cicero interrupting him, You need not, said he, O Cæsar; enlarge on this topic; we all know how kind Nicomedes was to you, and what favours you granted to him <sup>d</sup>. The name of Musa's son, so far as we can conjecture from Hircius and Appian, was Nicomedes; but as to the name and condition of his father, history has left us quite in the dark. After the defeat of Pharnaces, Cæsar appointed Nicomedes high-priest of Comana in Pontus, deposing Archelaus, whom Pompey had raised to that dignity, to make room for the grandson of his old friend Nicomedes IV. in whom ended the succession of the Bithynian kings, that country continuing subject to Rome from this time to the division of the empire.

Before we dismiss this subject, we must acquaint the reader, that some writers mention only three kings of Bithynia bearing the name of Nicomedes, and will have that Nicomedes to have died without issue, and bequeathed his kingdom to the Romans, who, at their instigation, made war upon Mithridates. But we have followed Appian, who seems to have wrote on this subject with the greatest exactness.

Cities of note in this country were, Pityus, called by Strabo Cities. the great City <sup>e</sup>, and by Pliny <sup>f</sup>, a place of great wealth. It stood on the frontiers of the Bosporani, and was on that account in the Roman times well fortified and garisoned, as we read in Zosimus and Procopius, who tell us, that it served as a barrier to keep out the Sarmatians and other barbarous nations <sup>g</sup>. Dioscurias, or Dioscorias, on the Euxine sea, built either by Castor and Pollux, two of the Argonauts, as Mela will have it <sup>h</sup>, or by Amphitus and Cercius their charioteers, as we read in Ammianus Marcellinus <sup>i</sup>, and Isidorus <sup>k</sup>. It was named Dioscurias from Castor and Pollux, whom the Greeks called Dioscuroi. This name was, according to Arrian <sup>l</sup> and Ptolemy <sup>m</sup>, in process of time changed into that of Sebastopolis; but Pliny <sup>n</sup> will have Dioscurias and Sebastopolis to be two different cities. from most parts of the world ; for Pliny ° tells us, that three hundred different languages were spoke there ; and that the Romans, who traded to Colchis, were obliged to maintain constantly in Dioscurias a hundred and thirty interpreters. This city is at present known by the name of Savatopoli. Aea, on the Phasis, and about fifteen miles from the Euxine sea, called by Pliny ° and Apollonius ° a famous city. Some writers take this to be the same with the city of Æopolis mentioned by Ptolemy. Phasis, so called from the river on which it stood. Here the Argonauts landed; which gave rise to the Greek proverb, to sail to Phasis, expressing a long and dangerous navigation ; for such was that of the Argonauts esteemed in those early times. Cyta, at the mouth of the river Cyaneas, the birth-place of the famous Medea, called from thence by the poets Cytæis †. The cities of Saracæ, Zadris, Surium, Madiā and Zalissa, are mentioned by Pliny, Strabo, and Ptolemy, but contained nothing worthy of notice. Colchis was watered by a great many rivers, viz. the Corax, the Hippus, the Cyaneus, the Charistus, the Phasis, the Absarus, the Cissa, and the Ophis, all emptying themselves into the Euxine sea. The Phasis does not spring from the mountains of Armenia, near the sources of the Euphrates, the Araxes, and the Tigris, as Strabo, Ptolemy, Pliny, Dionysius, and after them Hadrian, Reland, Calmet, and Sanson, have wrongly informed us ; but rises on mount Caucasus, and flows, not from south to north, but from north to south, as appears from the map of Colchis or Mingrelia in Thevenot's collection, and the account which Sir John Chardin gives us of that country. This river forms in its course a small island, called also Phasis, whence the pheasants, if Isidorus is to be credited †, were first brought into Europe, and thence called by the Greeks phasianoï. The other rivers of Colchis are scarce worthy notice.

Inhabitants.

THE Colchians were, according to Herodotus †, originally Egyptians, Sesostris having left part of the army with which he invaded Scythia, in Colchis, to people that country, and guard the passes. The Colchians, says our historian, are undoubtedly of Egyptian descent, as is visible from the personal similitude they bear to the Egyptians, being, like them, swarthy, and frizzle-haired ; but more especially from the conformity of their customs, for they use circumcision, as the Egyptians do, and many other ceremonies practised by the inhabitants of Egypt. There is likewise, says the same historian, such an affinity between the language of Colchis and that which is commonly spoke in Egypt, as leaves us no room to doubt of their coming originally from that country. Apollonius <sup>u</sup>, Diodorus Siculus <sup>w</sup>, Strabo <sup>x</sup>, Eustathius <sup>y</sup>, and Marcellinus <sup>z</sup> agree with Herodotus. Bochart <sup>a</sup> takes the Colchians and the Castubim of Mosæ, from whom the Philistines were descended, to be one and the same people, forgetting therein, that the Philistines did not use circumcision, which Herodotus assures us the Colchians did. In process of time many other nations settled in Colchis, viz. the Heniochi, the Ampreutæ, the Lazi, the Ligures, the Marfi, the Istri, the Moschi, and the Manralæ. From the latter people some derive the present name of Mingrelia. The whole kingdom of Colchis was, in antient times, very pleasant and fruitful, abounded with all necessaries of life, and was enriched with many mines of gold; which gave occasion to the fable of the golden fleece, and the Argonautic expedition so much spoke of by the antients.

Egyptians

THE Colchians were governed by their own kings in the Govern-earliest ages; for Pliny tells us, that Sesostris king of Egypt ment and was overcome and put to flight by the king of Colchis <sup>b</sup>; kings.
which, if true, shews, that the Colchians not only had kings in those times, but were a very powerful people. We have observed above, that Herodotus derives the Colchians from the Egyptians; but that writer must have meant the Colchians of his own time, and not the first inhabitants, since Colchis, even according to his own account, was peopled before the arrival of the Egyptians in those parts. It is not therefore improbable, that the descendants of Hul, who are said to have settled in Armenia, passed from thence into the neighbouring country, calling it Colchis, from their progenitor Hul or Cholc. But of their kings we know very little. The names of those we find mentioned in history, are Helius, Æetes, Æetes II. Salauces, Eusubopes, Olthaces, and Aristarchus. Helius is mentioned by Diodorus Siculus, Pausani- Helius.
as, Strabo, and Cicero, as reigning before the Argonautic expedition; but what they relate of him is altogether fabulous, and therefore not worthy of notice in history. He was succeeded by his son Æetes, whom he had, according to some, Æetes.

by Ephyre, according to others, by Antiope or Persa. Æetes received Phryxus flying with his sister Helle from their step-mother Ino in a ship, on whose head was a golden, or rather a gilt, ram. In his reign happened the famous expedition of the Argonauts, of which we have spoke elsewhere <sup>d</sup>. The Argonauts were a company of Greek adventurers, who hearing of the gold mines of Colchis and the immense riches of king Æetes, resolved to sail thither, in hopes of making their fortunes by one voyage. Accordingly they caused a ship to be built at Pegasa by one Argus, from whom they called it Argos; and hence they were stiled Argonauts. On this ship they embarked, and having one Typhis for their pilot, they steered their course through the Ægean sea, the Hellspont, the Propontis, the Thracian Bosphorus, and, after many adventures entering the Euxine sea, landed at Phasis, where king Æetes, who then resided there, received them with great kindness. As that prince had great store of gold in his palace, the Argonauts, those heroes so much cried up by the antients, conspired among themselves, either to seize on his treasures by force, or to steal them privately, and, saving themselves on board their ship, return with the booty into Greece; but finding them to be too well guarded to be either taken by force, or privately conveyed away, they corrupted the guards by means of Medea the king's daughter, who was in love with Jason, got into the palace undiscovered, and carrying off the treasures, returned into Greece with Medea, whom Jason had promised to marry. This is according to Natalis Comes <sup>e</sup>, the genuine account of the Argonautic expedition, which the poets, as it was the most remarkable voyage the Greeks undertook in those early days, have embellished and disguised with innumerable fictions, but not without some ground as to the golden fleece; for Strabo tells us <sup>f</sup>, that as the rivers issuing from the mountains of Colchis carried with them great quantity of gold ore, it was a custom among the inhabitants to lay fleeces in the water, and by that means stop the ore. Pasiphae and the famous Circe are said by some to be the daughters of Helius, by others of Æetes. Of them many things are related by the poets, which it is beneath the dignity of history to take notice of. The reader will find the fables of the poets relating to Circe, Medea, and Pasiphae very ingeniously explained by Natalis Comes in his mythology <sup>g</sup>. Upon the death of Æetes, Colchis, as Strabo informs us <sup>h</sup>, was divided into several petty kingdoms; but on what occasion we know not; for we find no further mention of the affairs of Colchis, or the princes who reigned there, till the time of Xenophon, who tells us, that the son of Æetes, the second of that name, reigned in Colchis, while he was making war in Asia<sup>1</sup>. Salauces and Eusubopes are mentioned by Pliny<sup>2</sup>, and said to have discovered rich mines of gold in the country of the Savani; but that writer leaves us quite in the dark as to the time in which they reigned. Colchis was afterwards subdued by Mithridates the Great; but revolted from him while his forces were employed against the Romans. The king of Pontus had no sooner concluded a peace with Sylla, than he marched against the Colchians, who offered to submit, upon condition that he would appoint his son to reign over them, with the title of king of Colchis. This proposal provoked Mithridates to such a degree, that he caused the son, whom they had demanded, to be arrested and loaded with chains of gold, sacrificing him soon after to his jealousy and ambition. Hereupon the Colchians obstinately refused to submit upon any terms; which obliged Mithridates to draw together all his troops in order to reduce them by force: but as he passed through the country of the Achæans, that people attacked him with so much vigour, and defended the passes with such resolution, that he was forced to return into Pontus, after having lost great part of his army, what by the enemy's ambuscades, what by the excessive cold of the country<sup>3</sup>. These Achæans were originally Greeks; and are said to have settled on the eastern coast of the Euxine sea, whither they had been driven by a storm, as they were returning from the siege of Troy. Colchis, while subject to Mithridates, was governed by prefects sent thither by him. One of these was Moaphernes, great uncle to Strabo the geographer, as that writer informs us<sup>4</sup>. Memnon tells us, that Mithridates complied with the request of the Colchians, and appointed his son Mithridates to reign over them; but soon after caused him to be put to death. Be that as it will, it is certain, that the Colchians sided with Mithridates against Pompey, and were, during that war, governed by a king of their own, viz. by Olthaces, who was overcome, Olthaces taken prisoner, and led in triumph by Pompey<sup>5</sup>. Olthaces was succeeded by one Aristarchus; but all we know of him Aristarchus is, that Pompey conferred upon him the kingdom of Colchis chus.

for his eminent services during the Mithridatic war<sup>o</sup>. Pharnaces II. king of Pontus seized on the kingdom of Colchis, and recovered great part of Pontus, while Cæsar was diverting himself with Cleopatra in Egypt; but was soon obliged to abandon his conquests, and retire into the country of the Bosporani, where he was killed by Asander, as we have related in the history of Pontus. From this time we find no mention made of the Colchians till the reign of the emperor Trajan, to whom they submitted of their own accord<sup>p</sup>. Perhaps they were governed by their own kings; for Strabo makes the river Phasis the northern boundary of the Roman empire. Under the emperors Colchis was subject to the prætors who governed Bithynia and Pontus; but never was made part of any province.

Iberia. I B E R I A, now Georgia, was bounded on the west by Colchis and part of Pontus; on the north by mount Caucasus; on the east by Albania; and on the south by Armenia. It contained the following cities, Nubium, Varica, Sura, Artanissa, Mestleta, Zalissa, Armatlica, and Phryxum, called afterwards Idiessa. These cities are mentioned by Strabo<sup>q</sup>, Pliny<sup>r</sup>, and Ptolemy. The only rivers of note in Iberia are the Cyrus, of which we shall have occasion to speak in the description of Albania, and the Aragus, which springs from the mountains separating Iberia from Colchis, and falls into the Cyrus. Pliny mentions another river, which he calls Iberus, and from which some writers derive the name of Iberia. Of mount Caucasus, which separates Iberia from Sarmatia Asiatica, we have spoke elsewhere<sup>s</sup>; and in the history of Pontus and Armenia described the Paryadrian and Moschian mountains. This country was anciently inhabited by the following nations or tribes enumerated by Pliny<sup>t</sup>, viz. the Moschi, and Armenochalybes, the Sacassani, the Macrones, the Sylvi, the Diduri, and the Sodii. Iberia was first peopled, according to Josephus<sup>u</sup>, by Tubal the brother of Gomer and Magog. His opinion is confirmed by the septuagint; for

Masfesch and Tubal are by those interpreters rendered Maschi and Iberians <sup>w</sup>. Some have taken the Iberia which was peopled by Tubal, according to Josephus, for Spain, called also Iberia; but this opinion we have confuted elsewhere <sup>x</sup>, Strabo <sup>y</sup>, and after him Eustathius <sup>z</sup>, derive the Iberians in Asia from the Iberians in Celtiberia or Spain; others, as Appian informs us, derive the latter from the former. As these two nations lay at a great distance from one another, and greatly differed in their manners, customs and language, some were of opinion, as we read in the same Appian <sup>a</sup>, that they were no ways related to each other. Tacitus supposes, both the Iberians, and the Albanians, their neighbours, to have come originally from Thessaly with Jason <sup>b</sup>; but whatever their origin was they were a very brave and warlike nation, and maintained their independency, if Plutarch is to be credited <sup>c</sup>, against the utmost efforts of the Medes, Persians, and Macedonians. Strabo gives us the following account of their customs and polity <sup>d</sup>. The Iberians, says he, are divided into four ranks or classes; the first consists of the nobility, the second of priests; the third of soldiers and husbandmen; and the fourth of the common people. Out of the first class they chuse their king, and, upon his death, raise always to that dignity the eldest of his relations. The next in age to him of the royal family administers justice and commands the army. The common people are employed in the lowest ministries, and treated no better than slaves. The priests, besides their peculiar function, hear causes, and decide such controversies as arise between the natives and foreigners. The Iberians who inhabit the champaign country, are very industrious, and well skilled in agriculture; but those who live on the mountains, are a wild and savage race, and in their manners bear a great resemblance to the Scythians and Sarmatians; whereas the former imitate both the dress and customs of the Medes and Armenians. Thus far Strabo. The monarchical form of government prevailed a-dates by Pompey, Artoces sent ambassadors to the Roman camp, enjoining them to conclude a peace with Pompey upon honourable terms, and, in the mean time, drew together an army of seventy thousand men, with a design to fall upon the Romans unawares, in case they did not grant him the conditions he required; but Pompey, being informed of the measures he was taking, advanced by long marches into Iberia, took Heropolis, a city or fort, built as appears from the name, on the summit of a mountain, penetrated into the very heart of the kingdom, and obliged Artoces to shelter himself in the most remote parts of his dominions. From thence he sent ambassadors anew to Pompey, and by their means obtained a peace upon very reasonable terms; but notwithstanding this agreement, Artoces still kept his troops together, designing to fall upon the Romans as they passed the river Pelorus. This Pompey suspected, and therefore following him close, came up with him before he reached the above-mentioned river, and drew him to an engagement in which the Iberians behaved with great gallantry, but were obliged to give way to the superior valour of the Romans, who killed nine thousand on the spot, and took above ten thousand prisoners. Great numbers were drowned, as they attempted to save themselves by swimming over the Pelorus. Many fled to the forests, and climbing up to the tops of the tallest trees, defended themselves from thence with their arrows; but the Romans setting fire to the forest, obliged them to surrender at discretion. After this defeat, Artoces, suing for a peace in good earnest sent from beyond the Pelorus rich presents to Pompey, viz. his bed, his table, and his throne, all of massy gold, which the Roman general accepted, and delivered to the quæstor of the army; but would not hearken to any terms of an accommodation, till the king had delivered to him his sons as hostages; and then he concluded a peace upon terms no ways dishonourable to the Iberian nation. This king is called by Appian Artocus, by Eutropius, Arthaces, by Sextus Rufus Arfaces, and lastly, by Dion Florus, and Orosius, whom we have followed, Artoces. ancients, are, Mithridates, Pharasmenes, Mithridates, II. Rhadamistus, and Pharasmenes II. But as these were also lords of Armenia, we have spoke of them in the history of that kingdom. Pharasmenes II. reigned in the time of the emperor Adrian, went to Rome with his wife and children, to clear himself before the emperor, of several things laid to his charge by Vologeses II, king of Parthia, and was there not only allowed to offer sacrifices in the capitol, but honoured with an equestrian statue erected in the temple of Bellona<sup>b</sup>. From this time, to the division of the empire, there is a profound silence among authors with respect to the affairs of Iberia. They continued in all likelihood to be governed by their own kings, who were tributaries to Rome; for we do not find Iberia counted by any writer, or mentioned in the antient notitias, among the provinces of the empire; and besides, we know, that, long after the division of the empire, they were subject to their own princes; for Procopius tells us, that after they had embraced the Christian religion, Gyrgenes, their king, being threatened with a war by Cavadēs king of Persia, in case he did not conform to that of the Persians, implored the assistance of the emperor Justin, which kindled a war between the two empires. Zonabarzes, another of their kings, came to Constantinople, as the same author informs us, in the time of the emperor Justinian, to be baptized, with his queen, his children, and several noblemen of his court. Iberia is at present subject to the king of Persia, and known to the Persians by the name of Gurgistan, that is, the land of the Georgians; for tan is an ancient Celtic word, signifying a country, and still in use among the eastern nations, as appears from the modern names of Curdistan, Indostan, &c. that is, the country of the Curdes, of the Indians, &c. As to the name of Georgia, some writers are of opinion, that the ancient Iberia was so called, either from St. George the famous Cappadocian martyr, held here in great veneration, or from George a Cappadocian bishop, by whom the inhabitants were first converted to christianity. Others, supposing the country to have been called anciently Gordiæa, and the inhabitants Gordiæans, from the Gordiæan mountains, take the words Georgia and Georgians to be a corruption of Gordiæa and Gordiæans; but this opinion is intirely groundless, the Gordiæan mountains being placed by all the antient geographers in Armenia, at a considerable distance from Iberia.

Some think, that the inhabitants were called Georgi, from their skill in husbandry, the Greek word georgos signifying a husbandman, and that the country was from them named Georgia. Pliny, enumerating the Caspian nations, mentions the Georgi from whom perhaps the ancient Iberia borrowed the name of Georgia, that country lying at a small distance from the coasts of the Caspian sea, which was inhabited, according to Pliny, by the Georgi, who, in process of time, may have settled in Iberia, from which they were parted by the small kingdom of Albania.

A L B A N I A.

ALBANIA was bounded on the west by Iberia; on the east by the Caspian sea; on the north by mount Caucasus; and on the south by Armenia<sup>1</sup>. It contained anciently a great many cities, but not of any note. The following are mentioned by Strabo, Ptolemy, and Pliny; Telaba, Thalbis, Gelda, Thiauna, Thabilaca, Albana, Chadaca, Misia, Boziata, and Cabalica, which Pliny calls the metropolis of Albania. The rivers which it may be proper to take notice of, are, the Cyrus or Cyrnus, the Albanus, the Cassus, the Gerrhus, the Soana, the Cambyses, and the Alaxan<sup>2</sup>, all emptying themselves into the Caspian sea. The Cyrus, now the Kür, springs from the Moschian mountains, which separate Colchis from Armenia, waters the country now called Mokan, receives into its channel the Aragas and the Araxes, and falls into the Caspian sea, within, but at a small distance from, the southern borders of the ancient Albania. There is a great disagreement among the ancient geographers about the mouths of this river; Strabo, Plutarch and Appian say, that it discharges itself into the sea by twelve mouths. Strabo indeed, who advances nothing for certain in his descriptions of countries but what he has seen, speaks with great reserve, and only tells us, that the Cyrus is said to discharge itself by twelve mouths into the Caspian sea. Herodotus will have this river to fall into the sea by forty mouths; but Pliny, with whom all our modern travellers agree, allows it but one. The whole country, now known by the names of Scirwan and East Georgia, is extremely fruitful and pleasant. Strabo describes the ancient Albanians as tall and strong-bodied men, and add, that they had, generally speaking, a very graceful mien, and far excelled all other nations in comeliness, as well as in stature. Our modern travellers cry up the women of Georgia and Scirwan for perfect beauties, but find nothing extraordinary in the men; whereas the antients admired the men, without taking any notice of the women. The same Strabo tells us, that the manners of the Albanians were very simple; that they were unacquainted with weights, measures, and the use of money; that they could not count above a hundred; and that trade was carried on among them only by exchange. Pliny tells us, that they held old age in great veneration; that they were of a very fair complexion, and thence, according to some, called Albani; that they could see as well by night as by day; and that not only the men were stout and courageous, but also the women, whom, he pretends to be descended from the antient Amazons. As to their origin, Tacitus<sup>1</sup> and Pliny<sup>m</sup> derive them from the Thessalians who attended Jason in his expedition into Colchis, and settled in this part of the isthmus between the Euxine and Caspian seas. Justin<sup>n</sup> will have them to be descended from the inhabitants of Alba in Italy, who followed Hercules into those parts, after he had overcome Geryon. Amnianus Marcellinus takes the Albani and Alani to be one and the same people, and derives them both from the Maffagetae, of whom we have spoke elsewhere<sup>o</sup>. As to their form of government, the country was in antient times divided into a great many small kingdoms. Strabo tells us, that no fewer than twenty six different languages were spoke formerly in Albania; and that there were as many different kings and kingdoms as languages, each tribe having their peculiar king<sup>p</sup>. But the Albani, in process of time, prevailed over the other petty princes, and made themselves masters of the whole country. In Pompey's time they could bring into the field, as Strabo informs us<sup>q</sup>, sixty thousand foot and twenty thousand horse. We find no mention made of their kings till the reign of Alexander the Great, to whom the king of Albania is said by Pliny<sup>r</sup> and Solinus<sup>s</sup>, to have presented a dog of an extraordinary fierceness and size. The next king of Albania we find mentioned in history is Oræses, who, entering into an alliance with Tigranes the son of Tigranes the Great, obliged Pompey to march against him. Cops, the king's brother, a brave and enterprizing prince, commanded the Albanians, and waited for Pompey on the banks of the Cyrus, which he fortified at certain distances with high palisadoes. Hereupon Pompey feigning to return to Armenia, marching his army a great way about, and drawing up his cavalry and beasts of burden in the bed of the river, to break the force of the stream, passed it without being discovered by the enemy. From the Cyrus he pursued his march to the Cambyfes, through a dry country, where his army suffered much for want of water. At length, after having rambled far out of the way, being led astray by his guides, who were Albanians, he reached the Cambyfes, where his soldiers were seized with strange distempers, occasioned by their drinking too greedily of the water of that river while they were hot after their march; however, he still advanced, with the precaution of carrying ten thousand skins full of water, lest he should be again reduced to the same straits. He heard no news of the enemy till he had passed the Abas or Albanus, when he was informed, that Cosis was advancing full march against him, at the head of threescore thousand foot, and twelve thousand horse. Upon his approach he concealed the legionaries among the thick bushes, with which the whole plain was covered, commanding them to cover their helmets with their bucklers, lest the rays of the sun reflecting on them, should discover them at a distance. Then he detached the cavalry, with orders to attack the enemy, and, retiring before them, draw them into the ambuscade. The stratagem had all the success Pompey could expect; for the legionaries starting up all on a sudden, and widening their ranks to let the cavalry retire, surrounded the Albanians on all sides, and put them to flight with great slaughter. On this occasion Cosis behaved with great valour and intrepidity; for he kept close to Pompey during the whole time of the engagement, and having had at last an opportunity of discharging a blow at him, pierced his breast-plate. Hereupon Pompey facing his adversary, threw his javelin at him with such vigour, that he laid him dead at his feet. The Albanians, disheartened by the death of their general, fled in disorder to the neighbouring forest, which the Romans set on fire, crying aloud, while the forest was burning, Saturnalia, Saturnalia, to remind the Albanians, that they had attempted to surprize them in their quarters during the feasts of Saturn, and therefore ought to expect no quarter. Oræses, after the defeat of his troops, retired to mount Caucasus, and from thence sent ambassadors to strike up a peace with the conqueror, who willingly granted it, being desirous to put an end to this war, and turn his arms against the king of Parthia, who had entered Gordyene at the head of a mighty army<sup>t</sup>. It was constantly reported before the engagement we have spoke of above, that there were many Amazons in the Albanian army; but the Romans, who had given credit to that rumour, in stripping the dead on the field of battle, found none of those warlike females among them; whence they concluded this republic of military women to be a mere fable, adopted on too slight grounds by many credulous historians. Oræses is by some writers called Orodes, and said to have fought three unsuccessful battles with Pompey <sup>u</sup>.

Oræses was succeeded by his son Zoberes, who, having ventured an engagement with P. Canidius, Marc Antony's lieutenant, was by him intirely defeated, and obliged to sue for peace. In this war Canidius was powerfully assisted by Pharnabazus king of Iberia <sup>w</sup>. The next king of Albania we find mentioned in history is Pharasmenes, who, in the time of the emperor Adrian, committed great devastations in Armenia, Cappadocia, and Media, and was on that account summoned by the emperor to Rome. Pharasmanes refused to comply with the summons; but in the mean time, to appease Adrian, sent him some valuable presents, among which were many great coats, such as were wore in those days by military men, all of cloth of gold. These alone the emperor accepted, but with no other view than to affront the king who had sent them; for he caused three hundred criminals to be clad with them, and in that attire fight the wild beasts in the public theatre. Upon Adrian's death the king of Albania came to Rome, upon the first summons from his successor Antoninus Pius, who received him with great marks of esteem, and sent him back loaded with presents to his kingdom<sup>x</sup>. Trebellius <sup>y</sup> and Marcellinus <sup>z</sup> speak of two kings of Albania, whom they do not name, the one contemporary with Sapor I. king of Persia and the emperor Valerian; the other reigning in the time of Sapor II. and entering into an alliance with him against Constantius, the son of Constantine the Great. The Albanians continued to be governed by their own princes till the reign of Justinian II. who is said by Zonaras<sup>a</sup>, and other writers<sup>b</sup>, to have subdued Albania by his general Leontius. The three kingdoms, which we have here described, viz. Colchis, Iberia, and Albania, took up the whole isthmus between the Caspian and Euxine seas, and extended from the borders of Media Atropatene, Armenia, and Pontus, on the south, to the mountains Corax and Caucasus on the north. These mountains have been the subject of many poetical fables; but nothing has been feigned by the poets more improbable than what we read in some of the antient geographers, viz. that they were so high as to be illuminated by the rays of the sun even at midnight, it being certain that they are not much above two perpendicular miles in height. They are known to the present inhabitants by the names of Cocas and Cochias, which are, without doubt, a corruption of the antient name Corax. The Arabs call them the mountains of Raf. We shall conclude our account of these three kingdoms with the words of Sir John Chardin, who, in describing the present Georgia, which comprehends the greater part of the antient Colchis, Iberia, and Albania, speaks of it thus: “ Georgia is as fertile a country as can be seen; the “ bread is as good there as in any part of the world; the “ fruit of an exquisite flavour, and of different sorts; no “ place in Europe yields better pears and apples; no place in “ Asia better pomegranates. The country abounds with “ cattle, venison, and wild fowl of all sorts; the river Kûr “ is well stocked with fish; the wine is so rich, that the “ king of Persia has always some of it for his own table, “ &c. The inhabitants are robust, valiant, and of a jovial “ temper, great lovers of wine, and esteemed very trusty “ and faithful, endowed with good natural parts, but, for “ want of education very vicious. The women are gene“ rally fair and comely, and by their beauty recommend“ ed to the court of the king of Persia, whose wives and “ concubines are for the most part Georgian women. Na“ ture has adorned them with graces no-where else to be “ met with; it is impossible to see them and not love them;

 “ they are of a full size, clean limbed, small waisted, fair,
 “ and well-proportioned.” Thus far Sir John Chardin, to whose words, or rather panegyric on the Georgian women, we beg leave to subjoin a passage out of another modern traveller of no mean character<sup>d</sup>: “As to the Georgian women, “ (says he) they did not at all surprize us; for we expect-

 “ so that I may, I think, venture to contradict the accounts

 it is now time for us to take our leave of Georgia, and pass into the neighbouring kingdom of Bosporus.

Mæotis and the Euxine sea. Diodorus Siculus<sup>e</sup> confines the whom we have followed, extends it to the gulf Carcinites,

tants.

Pomponius Mela tell us, that Cimmerium was the chief city of the Cimmerians, a people famous for their robberies as early as in the days of Homer. These barbarians being driven out of their country by the Scythian Nomades, ravaged the finest provinces in the east, and penetrated as far as Sardis in Lydia, which they reduced; but being afterwards overcome by Halyattes king of Lydia, some of them returned to their antient habitation; and others, as most historians conjecture, advanced towards the north as far as the Baltic, and settled in the Cimbrica Chersonesus, now Jutland; for the Cimbri and Cimmerii are by most historians thought to be one and the same people. The other cities taken notice of by the antients in the Asiatic Bosphorus, are Sinda on the Palus Mæotis; Tanais, at the mouth of the river bearing that name, where the city of Asoph now stands; Paniardis, Tyrambe, and Gerasum, called by Ptolemy a Cimbrian village. The coast of the Euxine sea was inhabited by the Cercetæ, the Heniochi, the Moschi, and the Achæi, of whom we have spoke above. Strabo enumerates on the coast of the Palus Mæotis the following nations, the Sindi, Dandarii, Agri, Arrichi, Tarpetes, Obidiaceni, Sittaceni, Dosci, and Aspungitani. To these Scylax adds the Coraxi, the Coraci, or, as Vossius will have it, the Colici, and the Melanchleni. The country bordering on the Palus Mæotis and the Bosphorus, which was inhabited by the Cimmerii, is represented by the antients as an inhospitable place, covered with thick forests and continual fogs, which the rays of the sun could not break through. This frightful description gave Cicero and Ovid occasion to say, that an eternal night reigned in this gloomy climate, and that sleep had taken up its abode here; and hence Cimmerian darkness became, according to Lactantius, a proverb, signifying an impenetrable darkness, and likewise a gloomy and stupid mind. Lycophron, Pliny, Eustathius, Servius, and others, have planted a colony of Cimmerians in Italy between Cumæ and Baiæ, near the lake Avernus, and tell us, that the sun never shined on that small canton; but Strabo, who was better acquainted with the countries we are speaking of, describes them as abounding with all the necessities of life, and rather pleasant than disagreeable. The rivers mentioned by the antient geographers in this tract are, the Anticites or Pandarus, the Pjathis, the greater and lesser Rhombites, and the Marubius, most of them springing from the mountains of Sarmatia Asiatica, and all emptying themselves into the Palus Mæotis.

Rivers.

Taurica Chersonesus.

THE Taurica Chersonesus, so named from its being a peninsula, antiently inhabited by the Tauri, or Tauroscythæ, as Pliny

Pliny and Ptolemy call them, lies between the Euxine sea, the Palus Mæotis, and the Bosporus Cimmerius; extends, according to Sir John Chardin, sixty one leagues from east to west, and about thirty five from north to south, and is joined to the continent by a narrow isthmus about a mile over. The cities here of note in former times were, Taphræ or Taphrus, on the isthmus, where the present city of Przekop or Prekop stands. The modern city is so called from the word przekop signifying a ditch; for it was built on the ditch which the Tartars cut across the isthmus. Cherronesus, or as the more modern Greek writers call it, Cherson, was, according to Strabo, built by the Greeks on the gulf Carcinites, now the gulf of Nigropoli, on the west coast of the Chersonesus. Of this city, now called Topetarkan, there are still many ruins to be seen. Theodosia, or Theudofia, another Greek city, on the east coast of the peninsula, once a place of great note. It is now known by the name of Caffa, and is the capital of Little Tartary. From this city the Bosporus Cimmerius of the ancients is called by the present inhabitants the streights of Caffa. Sanfon places Theodosia where the modern city of Tusfa stands. Nymphæum, Lagyra, Charax, &c. stood on the Euxine sea, and Panticapæum on the Bosporus. This city was, according to Strabo, the metropolis of the European Bosporus. It was founded by the Milesians, and for some ages governed by its own laws; but at length subdued by the kings of Bosporus. Some writers have confounded the cities of Panticapæum and Bosporus; but Pliny, Strabo, and Stephanus speak of them as two different cities. Procopius often mentions the latter; but never takes any notice of Panticapæum, tho' the capital of Taurica Chersonesus. This peninsula is at present possessed by the Tartars, and commonly known by the name of the Crim, which it borrowed from the city of Krym, antiently called Creimnos. The Bosporus Cimmerius, now the streights of Kertzi or Caffa, which divides Europe and Asia, or the Crim and Kuban, is not above four leagues over. The Palus Mæotis extends from south-west to north-east about one hundred and thirty leagues, having on the north and west Little Tartary; on the south-west the Chersonesus Taurica, now the Crim; and on the east and south-east Sarmatia Asiatica, now Circass Tartary. This sea or lake was called by the ancients Palus Mæotis, from the Mæotæ or Mæotici, a people inhabiting the European, and part of the Asiatic coast, and also Palus Sarmatiæ, Cimmeriæ Paludes, Scythica Stagna, and Ponti Euxini mater, or the mother of the Euxine sea; but its modern name is the sea of of Zabach, borrowed from a fish taken there at certain seasons of the year.

Bosphorus.*

THE Bosporani were governed by princes of their own in the earliest times; but as the works of Trogus Pompeius, who wrote the history of the Bosporan kings <sup>k</sup>, have not reached us, we can give but a very indifferent account of them. The first we meet with in history is Leucon, who is mentioned by Strabo <sup>l</sup>; but we are quite in the dark both as to his reign, and to that of Parisades, whom Strabo calls the last of his race. Diodorus Siculus tells us, that many kings had reigned in Bosphorus before the consulate of M. Genutius Augurinus and P. Curvatus Philo. Hence it is plain, that Leucon and Parisades were not, as some authors have thought, the founders of the Bosporan kingdom, but preceded by a long series of princes of the same race. Spartacus I. succeeded Parisades, and is said by Diodorus Siculus in one place to have reigned seven years, and in another seventeen <sup>m</sup>. He had two sons, viz. Seleucus and Spartacus. He left the kingdom to the former, who reigned four years, and dying without children, was succeeded by his brother Spartacus II. and he, after a reign of twenty-six years, by his son Satyrus, who reigned fourteen years <sup>n</sup>. After him came Leucon II. who waged war with one Mnemom, probably a neighbouring prince, by whom he was overcome, and with the Heracleans, over whom he gained considerable advantages. He had a particular regard for the Athenians, whom he supplied with a great quantity of corn in the time of a famine, and allowed their merchants a free trade to all the parts of his dominions. The Athenians, in return for his kindness, made him and his children free of Athens, and granted to his trading subjects the same privileges and exemptions in Attica, which their citizens enjoyed in Bosphorus, erecting three pillars in memory of the good understanding that passed between the two states, viz. one in the city of Bosphorus, another in the Piræus, and the third near the temple of the Argonauts. He was a great encourager of trade, granting ample privileges to all foreign merchants settling at Theodosia in the Chersonesus; by which means that city became one of the most rich and populous of the east <sup>o</sup>. His exploits were celebrated by Chrysippus the philosopher, as Plutarch informs us, but have not reached our times. He left two sons, Spartacus and Parisades. The former, surnamed Satyrus, succeeded him in the kingdom, and is called by Dinarchus the tyrant of Bosporus. He restored Hecatæus, a neighbouring prince, to his kingdom, obliging him to marry his daughter, and murder Tirgataone his former wife, in order to make room for her. This kindled a bloody war between him and the subjects of Hecatæus, in which he lost his son, with whose death he was so sensibly affected, that he did not long out-live him <sup>P</sup>. Dinarchus tells us <sup>Q</sup>, that both he and his brother Parisades sent yearly to Demosthenes a thousand bushels of wheat. He reigned only five years, and was succeeded, according to some, by his younger son Gorgippus; according to others, by his brother Parisades. Of Gorgippus we find nothing upon record. Parisades is said by Diodorus Siculus <sup>R</sup> to have reigned thirty-eight years. He left three sons, Satyrus, Eumelus, and Prytanis, who made war upon one another. Satyrus II. the eldest, succeeded his father; but his brother Eumelus, being assisted by Ariophanes king of Thrace, attempted to drive him from the throne. Satyrus had recourse to the Scythians, who sent to his assistance twenty thousand foot and ten thousand horse. With these, two thousand Greeks, and an equal number of Thracians, he engaged and put to flight Eumelus, whose army consisted of two and twenty thousand foot, and twenty thousand horse, all Thracians, under the command of Ariophanes or Ariopharnes their king. After this defeat Eumelus and the Thracian king retired to a strong hold, where they were closely besieged by the conqueror. While Satyrus continued before this place, Meniscus, who commanded the mercenaries, being surrounded by the enemy while he was attempting to storm the fort, Satyrus hastened to his relief, and rescued him from the imminent danger he was in; but was himself run through the arm with a spear, and died of the wound the night following, after a short reign of nine months. Upon his death Meniscus, breaking up the siege, retired with the army to the city of Gargara, and from thence carried the king's body to Panticapæum, and there delivered it to his brother Prytanis, who having buried it with great pomp, took upon himself the command of the army, and the title of king. Eumelus sent embassadors to the new king, offering to disband his forces, upon condition that he would divide the kingdom with him; but Prytanis not hearkening to his proposals, by the assistance of the neighbouring barbarians, he made himself master of Gargara, and several other cities.

Hereupon Prytanis marched against him, at the head of a numerous army ; but was overcome in a pitched battle, and being shut up within a narrow neck of land, between the Palus Mæotis and a lake, was forced to surrender, give up his army, and depart the kingdom ; but he soon returned, and, by the assistance of his friends, made himself master of some strong holds. Whereupon Eumelus marched against him anew, and having put his army to flight, pursued him to a place called the gardens, where he endeavoured to make head against his brother's victorious army, but was killed in the attempt. Upon his death Eumelus ordered all the friends and children of his two brothers Satyrus and Prytanis to be murdered. Parisades alone, the son of Satyrus, had the good luck to make his escape to the court of Agaras king of the Scythians ; all the others were inhumanly massacred. This cruelty incensed the people, who were ready to revolt, and revenge the death of their friends with that of the tyrant, when Eumelus calling them together, promised to alter his conduct, restored to the cities their former privileges, freed them from all kind of taxes, and having by that means regained their affections, governed the kingdom with great equity and moderation to his death. He is celebrated by the antients as the greatest king who had ever reigned in Bosphorus ; for he not only defended his dominions against the neighbouring barbarians, who, at different times, invaded it with numerous armies, but would have brought all the nations round him under subjection, as Diodorus informs us, had he not been prevented by death, after a reign of five years, and as many months ; for as he was returning out of Scythia, in a chariot covered with a canopy, the horses taking fright, and the driver not being able to stop them in their career, the king threw himself out, but his sword intangling in one of the wheels, he was hurried away with the violent motion of the chariot, and killed. We are told, that he had been forewarned by an oracle to beware of a moving house, and therefore never ventured to go into any house, till his servants had thoroughly examined both the roof and foundation ; but when they understood that the horses had been frightened at the canopy placed on his chariot, they concluded that the prophecy was fulfilled <sup>c</sup>. He was succeeded by his son Spartacus III. who reigned twenty years. Many years after we read of Leucanor reigning in the Bosphorus Cimmerius, and paying a yearly tribute to the Scythians. He was treacherously murdered by one Arsacomas, a Scythian prince, for having re-

tus, his brother by a concubine, was placed on the throne by the Sarmatians, and maintained on it by them and by the Alani, and the Greek ftates of Asia, who willingly joined him againft the Scythians, who began to be too powerful in thofe parts; however, he could never enjoy his kingdom in peace and tranquillity, till he fubmitted to pay the Scythians a double tribute<sup>d</sup>. The next prince we find reigning in Bosphorus is Parisades III. who not being able to pay to Scilurus king of Scythia the unreafonable tribute he exacted, nor withftand fo powerful an enemy, voluntarily refigned the kingdom to Mithridates the Great, king of Pontus, after it had been held by his ancestors for the fpace of four hundred years, as Lucian, Diodorus Siculus <sup>w</sup>, and Strabo inform us<sup>x</sup>.
 In the time of the laft Mithridatic war the Bosporans revolted from Mithridates, and admitted Roman garifons into the cities of Phanegoria, Theodofia, Cherfonesus, and Nymphæum; but, upon the death of that prince, the whole country was reftored by Pompey to his fon Pharnaces, whom he honoured with the title of a friend and ally of the Roman people. During the civil war between Cæfar and Pompey, Pharnaces, not fatis-fied with the kingdom of Bosphorus, attempted the recovery of his father's dominions, croffed the Euxine fea, and reduced Colchis, Armenia Minor, and feveral places in Cappa- docia, Pontus, and Bithynia<sup>y</sup>. After the battle of Pharfalia, Cæfar fent Domitius Calvinus againft him with part of his army; but Domitius being overcome in a pitched battle, Pharnaces made himfelf mafter of the remaining part of Pon- tus and Cappadocia, and of all Bithynia; whence he was preparing to advance into Asia properly fo called; but in the mean time Cæfar leaving Egypt, where he was paffing his time in banquets and revels with Cleopatra, and croffing Syria, came unexpectedly upon Pharnaces, and having attacked him, without allowng any refpite either to his own men or to the enemy, gained a complete victory; an account whereof he wrote to one of his friends in the celebrated words, veni, vidi, vici, I came, I faw, I conquered; which, as they well expreffed the expedition by which he obtained fo fignal a

fled to Sinope with a thousand horse, and from thence sailed back into Bosporus; where he no sooner landed but Asander, whom he had appointed governor of that country during his absence, seized him, and put him to death, taking upon himself the title of king of Bosporus<sup>a</sup>. Hereupon Cæsar bestowed the kingdom of Bosporus on Mithridates the Pergamian, in regard of the eminent service he had done him in Egypt, as we have related in the history of that country<sup>b</sup>. At the same time he appointed him tetrarch of Galatia, which he had a title to in right of his mother, who was descended from one of those tetrarchs. He might also have laid claim to the kingdom of Bosporus in right of his father; for he was supposed to be the son of Mithridates the Great, his mother having been one of that prince's concubines, after the death of Menodotus of Pergamus her husband. But Cæsar, in appointing him king of Bosporus, gave him only an empty title; for Asander being in possession of the whole country, he was to settle himself on the throne by force of arms. With this view he raised what forces he could; but instead of gaining the kingdom, lost his life, being overcome and slain in battle by Asander, who, after his death, held the kingdom without any further molestation, the Romans not being at leisure, on account of their intestine broils, to give him any disturbance. He was a man of great courage and skill in the military art, and in neither reckoned inferior to any of the age he lived in; however, the emperor Augustus distrusting him, gave the command of the Bosporan troops, who served in the Roman army, to Scribonius; which Asander took so much amiss, that he abstained from all food, and by that means put an end to his life in the ninety third year of his age<sup>c</sup>. Upon his death, Scribonius giving out that he was the grandson of Mithridates, married Dynamis the daughter of Pharnaces, and possessed himself of the kingdom of Bosporus; but was soon driven out by Polemon, on whom Augustus had bestowed that kingdom. Polemon was the son of Zeno, a famous orator of Laodicea, and, after the battle of Philippi, had been by Marc Antony rewarded for his gallant behaviour, with that part of the kingdom of Pontus which lay next to Cappadocia. He attended the same Marc Antony in his expedition against the Parthians, by whom he was taken prisoner. He was afterwards sent by the king of Media to negotiate a peace between him and Antony; which he concluded to the great satisfaction of the triumvir, by whom he was on that consideration made king of Armenia Minor. After the battle of Actium, in which he fought with great bravery for Antony, he was not only pardoned by Augustus, but sent by him, or rather by Agrippa against Scribanius, whom he defeated, and drove from the throne. He engaged in several wars with the neighbouring barbarians, whom he kept in awe, preventing them from making incursions into the Roman territories; but was at length overcome, taken, and put to death by the Aspungitani, whom Strabo reckons among the nations that bordered on the Palus Mæotis. He had been honoured by Augustus some time before his death with the title of a friend and ally of the Roman people <sup>a</sup>. He left two sons, Zeno and Polemon II. The former, surnamed Artaxias, was by Germanicus made king of Armenia, to the great satisfaction of the Armenians, among whom he had been brought up <sup>f</sup>. The latter succeeded his father in the kingdom of Bosporus, which he afterwards exchanged in the reign of Claudius for part of Cilicia. We find no further mention in history of the Bosporani till the reign of Trajan, who, as Eutropius informs us <sup>g</sup>, received the king of Bosporus under his protection. In the time of Antoninus Pius, one Rhymetalces reigned in the Bosporus Cimmerius, and came to Rome to treat with the emperor about the affairs of his kingdom, as we read in Capitolinus <sup>h</sup>. Lucian tells us <sup>i</sup>, that the Bosporans, in his time, were governed by a king named Eupator; but what fate attended them thenceforth to the division of the empire, we find no-where recorded; and therefore shall proceed to a succinct account of the other kingdoms mentioned in the title prefixed to this chapter.

WE have delivered elsewhere <sup>k</sup> the history of Media, Media. from the earliest account of time to its being reduced by the Persians, by whom it was held to the reign of Darius Codomannus, when the other provinces of Media fell under the power of the Macedonians; but that which lay between mount Taurus and the Caspian sea withstood Alexander, being defended by one Atropatus, who, upon the downfall of the Persian monarchy, kept it for himself, and transmitted it to his posterity, who held it as sovereigns to Strabo's time <sup>l</sup>. From Atropatus it was called Media Atropatia, or simply Atropatene. In process of time it became a very considerable kingdom; for Strabo tells us <sup>m</sup>, that the kings of Atropatene could bring into the field forty thousand foot and twenty thousand horse. The metropolis of this kingdom is called by Strabo, Gaza; by Plutarch, Phrahata; and by Dion Praaspa. But as we have described elsewhere <sup>n</sup> this country, and given an account of the cities it contained, we shall proceed to the history of its kings. The first who reigned here was Atropatus, who being governor of this province in the time of Darius Codomannus, as we have hinted above, defended the narrow passes leading into it against Alexander, and upon his departure caused himself to be acknowledged king of the country. Upon the death of Alexander, Perdiccas, who had married his daughter, suffered him to enjoy his new kingdom without molestation. The other kings of Media we find mentioned in history, are Timarchus, Mithridates, Darius, and Artuasdes. Timarchus reigned in the time of Demetrius Soter king of Syria, who attempted, but without success, to reduce Media, as Trogus informs us <sup>o</sup>. Mithridates was contemporary with Mithridates the Great king of Pontus, whom he assisted against Lucullus. He married the daughter of Tigranes king of Armenia; but dying without issue, left the kingdom to his brother Darius, who likewise sided with Mithridates; but was overcome by Pompey <sup>p</sup>. Darius was succeeded by his son Artuasdes, or Artavasdes, on whom Marc Antony made war at the instigation of Artabazes king of Armenia; but was therein attended with bad success, as we shall relate in the history of Parthia. Upon the retreat of Marc Antony, Artuasdes falling out with his allies the Parthians, about the division of the Roman spoils, sent ambassadors into Egypt, acquainting Antony, that he was ready to join him with all his forces, and assist him to the utmost of his power in the reduction of Parthia. Hereupon the triumvir resolved to return into Parthia by the way of Media, and to attach Artuasdes more firmly to his interest, first sent him as a present the head of Artabazes his inveterate enemy, whom he had treacherously seized, and afterwards contracted a marriage for Alexander, one of his sons by Cleopatra, with a daughter of the king of Media; but in the mean time the civil war breaking out between Antony and Octavianus, Artasdes sent his forces to join the former, which gave the Parthians an opportunity of invading his dominions, and driving him from the throne. After having lived some time in Syria, he had recourse to the clemency of Octavianus, who received him into favour, and bestowed upon him the kingdom of Armenia Minor<sup>9</sup>. As for the kingdom of Media, it continued subject to the Parthians, who held it for many years, as we shall see in the history of that people. Some authors indeed speak of kings reigning in Media long after the times we are now writing of; but these princes were probably of the race of the Arsacidae; for Dion, Tacitus, and Josephus tell us, that the Parthian kings sometimes suffered their younger brothers to reign in Media.

BACTRIA or Bactriana, now Chorassan, was bounded Bactria. on the west by Margiana; on the north by the river Oxus; on the south by mount Paropamisus; and on the east by Asiatic Scythia and the country of the Massagetæ. It was a large, fruitful, and well-peopled country, containing, if Ammianus Marcellinus is to be credited<sup>r</sup>, a thousand cities; but of these we find only the following mentioned by the antients, Bactra, the metropolis of the country, called antiently Zariaspe. Some writers indeed make Bactra and Zariaspe two different cities; but Strabo<sup>r</sup> and Pliny<sup>r</sup> tell us in exprefs terms, that Bactra and Zariaspe were two names of one and the same city. Pliny places Bactra on the river Zariaspa; and Curtius on the Bactrus, at the foot of mount Paropamisus; but Ptolemy, disagreeing with both these writers, describes it as standing on the river Dargidus, in the heart of the country, at a great distance from mount Paropamisus, which was the southern boundary. From the river Bactrus, Curtius<sup>u</sup> will have both the city and country to have borrowed their names. The other cities of Bactria, mentioned by the antient geographers, are Alexandria, probably built by Alexander; Darapsa or Adraspa, the same city which Arrian calls Drapsaca <sup>w</sup>; Eucratidia, Cariata, both spoke of by Strabo <sup>x</sup>; the latter was destroyed by Alexander; Sisimethræ Petra, where Alexander solemnized his marriage with Roxana who was kept there; Maracanda, repaired, but not built, as Æneas Sylvius and Cambinus have imagined, by Tamerlan. The same writers tell us, that Maracanda was the birth-place of that great commander, but are therein contradicted by Chalcocondyles <sup>y</sup>. This city is now known by the name of Samaracanda; whence the present kings of Persia style themselves princes of Samaracanda, as David Chytræus informs us <sup>z</sup>. Ebusmi and Charracharta, now Chiariachar, were once two places of great note, being called by Ptolemy royal cities. The chief rivers of Bactria were, the Ochus, the Oxus, the Orgomenes, or, as Ptolemy calls it, Dargomenes, the Zariaspa or Zariaspes, the Artimis, and the Dargidus. Most of these rivers fall into the Ochus, which springs from mount Paropamisus and discharges itself into the Caspian sea. Paropamisus, or Parapamisus is a part of mount Taurus, and not of mount Caucasus, as those who attended Alexander in his expedition into India were pleased to call it <sup>a</sup>. That part of Bactria which was watered by the river Oxus, is described by the ancients as a very fruitful country, abounding with pastures, and well stocked with cattle of a very large size; but the southern parts were nothing but sandy deserts, without any tract or beaten way; infomuch, that travellers used to rest in the day-time, and pursue their journey in the night, guiding themselves by the stars, as on the sea, not without danger of being buried in the sand. The country was inhabited by the following nations, viz. the Salataræ, Zariaspæ, Chomatri, Comi, Acinacæ, Tambyzæ, Thocaræ, Marycæi, Amarispæi, and several others of less note. The Bactrians in general were reckoned good soldiers, being always at war, either among themselves or with the neighbouring nations, and enemies to all manner of luxury. Pliny tells us, that they used to expose their old people, when they attained to a certain age, to be devoured by fierce mastiffs, which they kept for that purpose, and called sepulchral dogs. The same author adds, that they allowed their daughters to keep company with whom they pleased, and that in-continency was no ways disreputable even to the women <sup>b</sup>. As to their government, they were ruled by kings in the earliest ages. Zoroaster is said by Eusebius <sup>c</sup> to have reigned in Bactria, and to have been contemporary with Ninus, who made war upon him, and subdued his country. But Ctesias mentions one Oxyartes as reigning in Bactria, when that country was reduced by Ninus, and will have Zoroaster to have been contemporary with Cyrus the Great. Pliny questions whether he ever reigned in Bactria; but of him and his writings we have spoke elsewhere <sup>d</sup>. All authors agree, that Bactria was subdued, first by the Assyrians, and afterwards by the Persians under Cyrus the Great, as we have related in the history of those two empires. It fell afterwards under the power of the Macedonians, and was held by the successors of Seleucus Nicator till the reign of Antiochus <sup>e</sup> Theas, when Theodotus, from governor of that province, became king, and strengthened himself so effectually in his new kingdom, while Antiochus was engaged in a war with Ptolemy Philadelphus king of Egypt, that he could never afterwards dispossess him of his new acquisitions <sup>f</sup>. He was succeeded by his son, named also Theodotus, who entering into an alliance with Arfaces, the founder of the Parthian monarchy, considerably enlarged his kingdom, while the two brothers Seleucus Callinicus and Antiochus Hierax were wasting their strength against each other <sup>g</sup>. Theodotus was overcome in battle, and driven out by Euthydemus his brother, who, as he was a very valiant and prudent prince, maintained a long war against Antiochus the Great, in defence of his country, obliging him at last to lay aside all thoughts of ever reducing it, as we have related in the history of Syria. Euthydemus was succeeded by his brother Menander, who, passing the river Hypanis, subdued the kingdom of Sigertis, the large province of Pattalena, and several other countries unknown even to Alexander the Great; but while he was preparing to make new conquests, and invade the Syrian dominions, he was taken off by a violent fever, to the great grief of his subjects, among whom his ashes were distributed, to quell the disturbances that arose on account of his body, which many cities laid claim to. By this means magnificent monuments were erected to his memory in most cities of Bactria <sup>h</sup>. He was succeeded by his nephew Demetrius, the son of Euthydemus, in whose name he had governed, that prince being very young at his father's death. Demetrius was no ways inferior to his uncle in courage and bravery; for he had not only maintained himself in the possession of the provinces which Menander had reduced, but made several new acquisitions, and at his death left the kingdom of Bactria in a most flourishing condition. His son Eucratides built the city of Eucratidia, and having invaded India, made himself master of all those provinces which had been subjected by Alexander. On his return to his own dominions, he was treacherously murdered by his son, named also Eucratides, to whom he had committed the government of the kingdom during his absence. So wicked an action did not go long unpunished; for the Scythians invading Bactria on one side, and the Parthians on the other, Eucratides was driven from the throne, and soon after killed in attempting to recover it. Upon his death the Parthians seized on the provinces of Aspionia and Thuriva, leaving all the rest to the Scythians, who held the kingdom of Bactria till the invasion of the Huns, of whom we shall have occasion to speak in a more proper place. The kings, whom we find mentioned as reigning in Bactria in the times of the emperors Adrian, Antoninus Pius, and Valerian, were all of Scythian extraction; but the Scythians were in their turn driven out by the Huns, who reigned in Bactria, as we read in our modern historians, in the time of Ladislavus IV. king of Hungary.

E D E S S A.

Edessa.

THE ancient city of Edessa is placed by geographers in Mesopotamia, on the banks of the Scirtus, between mount Mafius and the Euphrates, into which the Scirtus empties itself. It was once a place of great note, and famous for a temple of the Syrian goddess, which was reckoned one of the richest in the world, nations and princes sending thither presents and offerings from all parts of the east. From this temple Edessa was styled Hierapolis, or the holy city. During the intestine broils, which greatly weakened the kingdom of Syria, one Augarus or Abgarus seized on the city of Edessa and its fruitful territory, which he erected into a new kingdom, styling himself king of Edessa, and transmitting the same title to his posterity. Under which of the Syrian kings this revolution happened, we find no-where recorded. All we know of the founder of this new kingdom is, that he often defeated defeated the Syrians, to whom the country which he possessed had been long subject, and in spite of their utmost efforts, left at his death his small principality, as Egnatius<sup>h</sup> and Xylander style it<sup>i</sup>, in a very flourishing condition. He was succeeded by his son Ariamnes, or Abgarus II. for the name of Abgarus was common to all the kings of Edessa. This prince made himself master of the whole province of Osroene, and entering into an alliance with Pompey against Tigranes the Great king of Armenia, supplied his army with all manner of provisions. In the Parthian war he pretended to side with Crassus; but in the mean time maintaining a private correspondence with the enemy, was the chief cause of the great overthrow which the Romans received at Carrhæ, as we shall relate at length in the history of the Parthians. He left the kingdom to his son Uchanias, mentioned by Eusebius<sup>k</sup>, who was succeeded by his son Abgarus III. a prince much spoke of by the ecclesiastic writers, on account of the letters which he is supposed to have wrote to our saviour, and our saviour to him. These letters were found by Eusebius, as he assures us, in the public archives of Edessa, and by him translated out of the original Syriac into Greek, and inserted in his ecclesiastic history<sup>l</sup>. They are also spoke of by Nicephorus<sup>m</sup>, Cedrenus<sup>n</sup>, Dorotheus<sup>o</sup>, Evagrius<sup>p</sup>, Glycas<sup>q</sup>, Curopolates<sup>r</sup>, Nicetas<sup>s</sup>, &c. The last mentioned writer tells us, that our saviour's letter was stolen in the reign of Andronicus Comnenus, and never after heard of<sup>t</sup>. These letters have given occasion to many disputes among our modern writers, some maintaining them to be genuine, and others to be forged. This subject has been learnedly handled by Casaubon, Gretserus, Tillemont, Du Pin, and the late father Alexander, a writer of great note of the Dominican order, to whom we refer such of our readers as are desirous to be well acquainted with this controversy, which is altogether foreign to our subject. Abgarus IV. the son of the above-mentioned prince, reigned in the time of the emperor Claudius, and joined C. Cassius governor of Syria, who had been ordered by that emperor to place Meherdates on the throne of Parthia. When Meherdates arrived at Edessa, Abgarus, who had been gained over by the Parthians, detained him there, under various pretences, till such time as the enemy had drawn together their forces and, in the heat of the engagement; abandoning the Romans with the king of the Adiabeniens, brought on the defeat of their army<sup>u</sup>. The next prince of Edeffa, we find mentioned in history is that Abgarus, who was contemporary with the emperor Trajan, to whom he sent, during the war he waged with the Parthians, two hundred and fifty fine horses, a great many complete suits of armour, and sixty thousand javelins, Trajan accepted of three breast-plates only, and declared Abgarus a friend and ally of the Roman people<sup>w</sup>. Suidas sometimes calls him Abgarus, and sometimes Augarus, giving him in one place the title of king, and elsewhere styling him the chief, of the Edeffans. He was succeeded by his son Arbandes, who was highly favoured by Trajan. Abgarus VI. the son of Arbandes, is mentioned by Capitolinus, in his life of Antoninus Pius, and by Epiphanius, who calls him a most pious prince. Another prince of the same name reigned at Edeffa in the time of the emperor Severus, assisted him in the wars he waged in the east, and attended him to Rome, where he was, by the emperor's orders, received and entertained with the utmost pomp and splendor<sup>x</sup>. He was afterwards suspected by Caracalla of holding a correspondence with the enemies of Rome, and being summoned to justify himself before the emperor, he was, by his orders confined, and his kingdom reduced to a Roman province<sup>y</sup>. He is by Spartianus called king of Persia; but by Dion, Zonaras, and Herodianus king of the Osroëni, the dominions of the kings of Edeffa being confined within the narrow bounds of Osroëne, or, as others call it, Osdroëne, a province of Mesopotamia, bounded on the west and south by the Euphrates; on the east by the Chaboras or Aborras; and on the north by mount Taurus, dividing it from the Greater Armenia.

Emesa.

EMESA, Emisa, or Emiffa, was a city of Syria, placed by most of the antient geographers on the Orontes, between Apamea and Laodicea Cabiosa. This city one Sampsiceramus, an Arabian, seized during the troubles of Syria, and assuming the title of king, held Emesa, and its small territory, without the least disturbance from the Seleucidæ; who had other more important wars on their hands <sup>a</sup>. Sampsiceramus is often mentioned by Cicero in his letters to Atticus <sup>a</sup>. But Nizolius is of opinion, that Cicero, under that disguise, meant Pompey, who had overcome Sampsiceramus. He left two sons, Jamblichus and Alexander. The former succeeded his father, and, as he was greatly attached to the Romans, acquainted Cicero, while he governed Cilicia in quality of proconsul, with the motions and designs of the Parthians, who, under the conduct of Pacorus their king, were preparing to invade Syria. In the civil wars of Rome, he sided first with Cæsar against Pompey, and afterwards with Antony against Octavianus. After the victory gained by the latter at Actium, Antony, apprehending that he designed to follow the example of the neighbouring princes, who had all declared for the conqueror, got him into his power, and, upon that bare suspicion, caused him to be put to a most cruel death <sup>b</sup>. He is styled by Strabo, the petty king of the Emeseni; by Josephus, a petty prince of Arabia; and by Dion, prince of the Arabians. Upon his death the kingdom was by Antony bestowed on his brother Alexander, who continuing faithful to his benefactor in his greatest distress, was taken prisoner by Octavianus, and not only deprived of his kingdom, but carried in triumph, and afterwards put to death <sup>c</sup>. His son Jamblichus II. was received into favour by Octavianus, and by him restored to his father's kingdom, after he had lived some time in banishment <sup>d</sup>. Many years after him reigned Sampsiceramus II. whom some writers take to have been his grandson. He is mentioned by Josephus, who styles him king of the Emeseni <sup>e</sup>. He was succeeded by his son Azizus, who falling in love with Drusilla, the sister of Agrippa minor, embraced the Jewish religion, in order to marry her <sup>f</sup>. His sister Jotape was married to Aristobulus the brother of Agrippa the Great <sup>g</sup>. Azizus is the last king of Emesa we find mentioned in history. This small kingdom was perhaps seized by the Arabians; for some years after we find it possessed by the Ituræans. The emperor Heliogabalus was a native, as Evagrius informs us, of the city of Emesa.

Adiabene. AS we have described elsewhere the province of Adiabene<sup>b</sup>, which was the richest and most fruitful of all Assyria, we shall in this place only give a succinct account of the kings, who taking advantage of the disturbances that reigned among the Seleucidæ, erected here a new kingdom, and held it in spite of the Syrian kings, till they were driven out by the superior power of the Roman emperors. The first king we find mentioned in history, reigned in the time of the Mithridatic war, and joined Tigranes against Lucullus, as we read in Plutarch, tho' that author does not acquaint us with his name<sup>c</sup>. Many years after, that is, in the reign of the emperor Claudius, one Monobazus, called also Bazeos, ruled over the Adiabeniens. This prince falling in love with his sister Helena, married her, and had by her two sons, viz. Monobazus and Izates. He had several children by other wives; but as he favoured Izates above all the rest, this raised no small jealousy in his other sons, especially in Monobazus the eldest. To prevent therefore the evil consequences which his partiality might occasion in his family, he sent Izates to be brought up by one Abemerigus, lord, or, as Josephus calls him, king, of a rich country in that neighbourhood. Abemerigus, who then resided at a place called Spasimus, brought him up with great care, and gave him his daughter Samacha in marriage, and with her a rich and fruitful country by way of dowry. In the meantime Monobazus, as he was stricken in years, and desirous to see his favourite child before his death, sent for him, and receiving him with great tenderness, bestowed upon him the country of Cæron, which abounded with odoriferous plants, and was famous, as Josephus informs us, on account of the remains of Noah's ark, which were still to be seen there in his time. In this country Izates remained till his father's death, when his mother Helena calling together the chief lords of the kingdom, told them, That the deceased king had by his last will, appointed Izates to reign in his stead, as the most worthy of all his children; but that she had not thought proper to acquaint him therewith, till the honour, to which he had been destined by his father, was confirmed to him by the unanimous consent of his subjects. She had scarce uttered these words, when the nobles, prostrating themselves on the ground before the queen, according to the custom of the country, declared, that they approved the king's election, and were ready, not only to obey Izates, who had been deservedly preferred to his brothers but to put them all to death, that he might enjoy the kingdom without disturbance. The queen thanked them for their zeal, but at the same time desired them to forbear shedding the blood of any of the royal family, till the will of their new sovereign was known. Hereupon they intreated the queen to confine at least the young princes till the king's arrival, and in the mean time to appoint one to govern in his name. Helena readily complied with their request, and named her eldest son, Monobazus, guardian of the kingdom during his brother's absence, placing with her own hand the diadem on his head, and delivering to him his father's seal, with the robe, called by the Adiabeni-ans sampsera, and exhorting him to govern with justice and moderation till the arrival of his brother, to whom the crown belonged, both by the last will of his father, and the unanimous election of the people. In the mean time Izates, being acquainted with his father's death and the zeal his new subjects had shewn for him, hastened to his kingdom, where he was received with great rejoicings, and met by his brother Monobazus, who, on his arrival, resigned to him the diadem and other ensigns of royalty.

WHILE Izates was at the court of Abemerigus, he had been instructed in the Jewish religion by one Ananias, who, at his request, had attended him into the kingdom of Adiabene, and continued with him in the province of Cæron, which his father, as we have said above, had bestowed on him. His mother likewise, having been instructed by another Jew, had embraced that religion; but nevertheless did all that lay in her power to dissuade her son from circumcision, to which, as a zealous proselyte he had a great inclination, thinking himself obliged to comply with all the duties of the religion he had embraced, Ananias his instructor agreed with the queen, and fearing lest some misfortune might befall him, if the king's conversion, which had been brought about by his means, were publicly known, represented to him, that he might serve the true God without being circumcised; that since he had resolved to live according to the other laws of the Jews, God would pardon him this neglect in consideration of that resolution; that true religion consisted in the pious sentiments of the soul, and not in the circumcision of the body; which was indeed enjoined by Moses, but might be dispensed with in the present circumstances, considering the danger he was in of forfeiting his kingdom by an open profession of the Jewish religion, &c. Lastly, Ananias, who, it seems, was a time-server, threatened to forsake the pious prince,

if he did not lay aside, for the present, all thoughts of circumcision. By these remonstrances Izates was prevailed up on to suspend the execution of his design; but not long after another Jew, by name Eleazer, a man well versed in the law of Moses, and of great learning, arriving at the court, and finding the king, when he went to wait on him, reading the books of Moses, told him in plain terms, that he had offended both against God and the law; for it is not enough, said he, for any man to understand his religion; the main duty incumbent upon us is, to do what our religion commands us. How long will you remain uncircumcised? If you are unacquainted with the injunctions of the law touching this point, read it now, that you may no longer be ignorant of the guilt you incur, in omitting one of the most essential duties of your religion. Izates, struck with these words, immediately withdrew, and, in compliance with the law, submitted to the ceremony which it prescribed<sup>k</sup>. In his reign Artabanus king of the Parthians, being driven out by his rebellious subjects, had recourse to him, and was not only kindly received at his court, and treated like a king, but, by his good offices, restored to the crown, as we shall relate in the history of Parthia; in acknowledgment of which kindness, Artabanus yielded to him the fruitful province of Nisibis, which he had lately taken from the king of Armenia. Upon the death of Artabanus, a civil war breaking out in Parthia, between Gotarzes and Meherdates, Izates pretended to favour the latter, whose claim was supported by the emperor Claudius, but maintained the whole time a private correspondence with the former, and joined him at last with all his forces; which brought on the ruin of Meherdates, as we shall have occasion to relate in the history of Parthia<sup>l</sup>.

Monobazus, the king's elder brother, and the other princes of the royal family, finding that Izates had been attended with wonderful success, says Josephus<sup>m</sup>, in all his undertakings, ever since the change of his religion, resolved to follow his example; which so offended the chief lords of the kingdom, that entering into a conspiracy against their prince, who had first introduced the Jewish religion among them, they wrote privately to Abias king of Arabia, promising him great sums of money, on condition he would assist them in driving Izates from the throne, and assuring him that they were all to a man resolved to forsake him, and deliver him up to the first that should invade his dominions. Hereupon A-

Abias, having drawn together a considerable army, entered the kingdom of Adiabene, where he was met by Izates, and a battle ensuing, the Adiabeniens, at the first onset, fled as if they had been seized with a panic fear, and retired in great disorder to their camp. The king seeing himself abandoned by his men, retired with them, and having found, on examining the cause of so sudden a flight, that the private men had only followed the example of their leaders, and by that means discovered the whole plot, he caused the chief conspirators to be immediately put to death, and marching out the next day with the rest, fell unexpectedly upon the enemy, and gained a complete victory. The king of Arabia, being closely pursued by the Adiabeniens, sheltered himself in the fortress of Arsam, which Izates immediately besieged, and assaulted with such vigour, that it was soon obliged to surrender. He found there an immense booty, and great store of provisions; but Abias, by a voluntary death, escaped captivity, as did many of the Arabian lords who attended him<sup>n</sup>. The conspirators, tho' thus disappointed, still persisted in their former resolution of getting rid, by some means or other, of a king, who endeavoured to abolish their antient religion, and introduce a strange law. They therefore had recourse to Vologeses king of the Parthians, intreating him to assist them in driving from the throne Izates, and to give them a king of the race of the Arsacids, since they could not live under a prince, who countenanced a religion differing from that of his own country. Upon this invitation Vologeses marched with a mighty army against Izates, who, finding himself no-ways in a condition to oppose so powerful an enemy with his own strength, had recourse to prayers, beseeching the Almighty, for whose sake he was reduced to such straits, to exert his power in the defence of one who put all his confidence in him. He had scarce ended his prayer, when news was brought him, that Vologeses, who had encamped over-against him on the other side of the river, which parted Adiabene from Media, was retiring with great haste and confusion, upon certain advice, that the Dabæ and Sacæ, taking advantage of his absence, had invaded Parthia, and were committing everywhere most dreadful ravages<sup>o</sup>. Izates, being thus delivered, by the protection of heaven, from the imminent danger he was in of losing both his life and his kingdom, spent the remainder of his days in peace and tranquillity, and died in the fifty fifth year of his age, and twenty fourth of his reign. Josephus gives him a most extraordinary character, which he well deserved, if all that writer relates of him be true. He had by his wife Samacha or Samaco, the daughter of Abemerrigus, five sons, who were all brought up under their grandmother Helena at Jerusalem, and there taught both the Jewish language and religion. They were in that city while it was besieged by Titus, who generously pardoned them, and carried them with him to Rome, where they remained as hostages <sup>p</sup>. Helena, who was both mother and aunt to Izates, and a zealous profelyte to the Jewish religion, no sooner saw her favourite son settled on the throne, but she undertook a journey to Jerusalem, being desirous to visit the holy city, and offer sacrifices of thanksgiving in the temple, which was so renowned over all the world. Izates not only supplied her with all things that were necessary for her journey, in a royal and magnificent manner, and with large sums of money, but attended her in person great part of the way. On her arrival at Jerusalem, she was received by the priests and chief men of the nation in a manner suitable to her rank, and entertained with great splendor and magnificence; but soon after the city being most grievously oppressed by a famine, that, in all likelihood, which had been foretold by the prophet Agabus, as we read in the Acts <sup>q</sup>, the pious queen not only refused to be maintained at the public expence, but plentifully supplied the poor of the city with corn from Egypt, and other provisions from the island of Cyprus. She likewise persuaded her son Izates to send a considerable sum of money to the governor of Jerusalem, for the relief of the afflicted citizens <sup>r</sup>. These pious offices, and the zeal she shewed for the Jewish religion, gained her, as Josephus informs us, the affection of the whole nation. She continued in Jerusalem, where she built a magnificent palace, which was burnt by the Romans under Titus, & II the death of Izates, when she returned to Adiabene, and soon after died. Monobazus, who succeeded his brother Izates, sent his body, with that of his mother Helena, to be deposited in the magnificent monument, which she had erected with three lofty pyramids, about three furlongs from the city of Jerusalem <sup>s</sup>. This monument is mentioned by Eusebius <sup>t</sup>, St. Jerom <sup>u</sup>, and Pausanias <sup>w</sup>. The latter speaks of it in the following terms: Tho' I have heard of many monuments worthy of admiration, yet I shall here take notice of two only; the one at Halicarnassus, the other in the country of the Jews. The former, erected in honour of Mausolus king of Halicarnassus, was so magnificent and stately an edifice, that the Romans, struck with its extraordinary beauty and grandeur, called all majestic monuments mausoleums. The other, a monument of surprising workmanship, stands at a small distance from Jerusalem, and is the sepulchre of one Helena, a native of that country. It is all of marble, and has a door, which, on a stated day and hour of the year, opens by some hidden springs, and soon after shuts again. At other times you may break it down, but it is impossible to open it. Thus far Pausanias; but Josephus, who was better acquainted with the monuments of his own country than any of the Greeks, takes no notice of this prodigy. Orosius tells us*, that Helena embraced the Christian religion, and during the above-mentioned famine, supplied the indigent and distressed Christians with corn brought from Egypt for that purpose.

THO' Izates had several children, yet by his last will he bequeathed the crown to his brother Monobazus, rewarding him thereby for the great care and indefatigable fidelity, with which he had governed the kingdom during his absence, and the intire submission he had shewn him, tho' a younger brother, the whole time of his reign. But as to the affairs of this kingdom, there is a profound silence among authors, from the death of Izates, who was contemporary with the emperor Claudius, to the reign of Trajan, when one Mebarsapes ruled there, and joined Cosbroes king of the Persians against the Romans; but that war proving unsuccessful for him and his allies, he was driven from the throne, and obliged to shelter himself in the dominions of Manus king of Arabia, who attempted to restore him to his kingdom; but as the strong castle of Adenystæ was held by a Roman garison, which he could never dislodge, he was forced to drop the enterprize, and abandoning his friend and ally, conclude a peace with Rome†. We find no further mention made of the Adiabeni-ans, till the reign of Sapor II. king of Persia, when they embraced the Christian religion, as Sozomenus‡ and Nicephorus§ inform us, and were, on that account, treated with great cruelty by the above-mentioned king, to whom they were at that time subject.

Elymais. ELYMAIS or, as Strabo calls it <sup>b</sup>, Elymatis, was a province of Persia, lying between the rivers Eulæus and Oroates, and extending from the confines of Media to the Erythræan sea, or Persian gulf. It was formerly divided into three great districts, viz. Mesabatene, Gabene, or Gabiene, and Carbiana, and contained the following cities; Seleucia, in more antient times Soloe, on the banks of the Hedypus or Hedypnus, which Strabo <sup>c</sup> calls a great city; Sasirate, at a small distance from mount Casyrus; Badaca, on the Eulæus; and Elymais, the metropolis of the province, famous for a rich temple consecrated to Diana, which Antiochus Epiphanes attempted to plunder; but was obliged by the inhabitants to retire with disgrace, as we have related in the history of Syria. We must not confound this city with that of Persepolis, called also by some writers Elymais; for the city we are here speaking of stood in the province of Elymais, and the other in that of Persis. The temple of Elymais was afterwards plundered by one of the Parthian kings, who found in it, as Strabo tells us <sup>d</sup>, ten thousand talents. In this country there was also a very rich temple consecrated to Jupiter Belus, which Antiochus the Great attempted to plunder, but lost his life in the attempt, as we have related in the history of his reign. The country of Elymais was inhabited according to Pliny <sup>e</sup>, by the following nations, viz. the Oxii, or Uxii, Mizæi, Parthusi, Mardi, Saitæ, Hyi, Cossæi, Parætaceni, and Messabatæ. The Elymæans were, as Strabo informs us <sup>f</sup>, a powerful people, inured to the toils of war, skilful bowmen, &c. and never subdued either by the Syro-Macedonian or Parthian kings, but governed by their own princes. If what Strabo writes be true, we may date the rise of this kingdom from the downfall of the Persian monarchy; for it is agreed on by all the antients, that the Elymæans were subject to the kings of Persia, and if they never submitted to the Syrian yoke, they must have been first governed by their own princes, either in Alexander's life-time, or soon after his death. Their kings are often spoke of by the antients; but not one of them, which is somewhat surprising, named by any writer. All we know of them is, that they assisted Antiochus the Great in his wars with Rome; but afterwards cut off both him and his army in defence of their temple. The like fate would have attended Antiochus Epiphanes, when he attempted to plunder the temple of Diana, had he not, by a timely flight, retired into Media<sup>8</sup>. They afterwards, under the conduct of their king, engaged in a war against the Babylonians and Susians, in which they were assisted by the Cossæans, who, it seems, were not subject to the kings of Elymais, with thirteen thousand archers<sup>h</sup>. Justin writes<sup>i</sup>, that Mithridates king of Parthia, having overcome the king of the Elymæans, made himself master of all his dominions. But what Justin says is contradicted by Strabo, and also by Plutarch, who tells us in express words, that the Elymæans in Pompey's time were governed by their own kings<sup>k</sup>. But as neither their actions nor names have been transmitted to us, we shall dwell no longer on this barren subject.

CHARACENE was the most southern part of Susiana, Characene, a province of Persia, lying on the Persian gulf, between the Tigris and the Eulæus. It was so named from the city of Chorax, called first Alexandria, from its founder Alexander the Great; afterwards Antiochia, from Antiochus V. king of Syria, who repaired and embellished it; and lastly, Chorax Spasine or Pasine, that is, the mole of Spasines, an Arabian king of that name having secured it against the overflowing of the Tigris, which often laid it under water, by a high bank or mole, extending three miles, which served as a fence to all that country<sup>l</sup>. Dionysius Periegetes and Isidorus, author of the Parthicæ Mansiones, were both natives of this city. The small district of Characene was seized by Pasines the son of Sogdonacus, king of the neighbouring Arabs, during the troubles of Syria, and erected into a kingdom<sup>m</sup>. Lucian calls him Hyspasines, and adds, that he ruled over the Characeni and the neighbouring people, and died in the eighty fifth year of his age <sup>n</sup>. The other kings of this country we find mentioned by the antients, are Teræus, who died in the ninety second year of his age, and after him Artabazus the seventh, as Lucian informs us, who was driven from the throne by his own subjects; but restored by the Parthians <sup>o</sup>. And this is all we find in the antients relating to the kings of Charracene.

Comma-gene, or
ne.

THIS country, which was part of Syria, we have described elsewhere <sup>p</sup>, and therefore shall proceed to the history of its kings. Commagene was subject to the Syrians in the time of Antiochus the Great, and left to him by the treaty of peace, which he concluded with Rome after the famous battle of Magnesia; whence it is probable, that it was seized by some of the princes of the Seleucian family, during their intestine wars; for we find no mention made of the kings of Commagene till Pompey's time, and the names of those, who afterwards reigned there, are intirely Syrian. The first we find mentioned in history, is Antiochus, who, together with Darius king of Media, opposed Pompey as he entered Syria, after the defeat of Tigranes; but being overcome in battle, he submitted to the conqueror, and was for his submission not only confirmed by Pompey in his kingdom, but rewarded with part of Mesopotamia <sup>q</sup>. In the civil war between Cæsar and Pompey he sent large supplies to the latter. He afterwards joined Pacorus king of Parthia, whom Labienus had invited into Syria, and was on that occasion besieged by Ventidius in the city of Samosatæ, and obliged to purchase a peace with Marc Antony with three hundred talents. In the reign of Augustus a dispute arising between him and his brother Mithridates, he caused the ambassador, whom his brother had sent to plead his cause at Rome, to be treacherously assassinated. Whereupon he was summoned to appear before the senate, and being by that body found guilty of the murder laid to his charge, he was by the emperor's orders put to death <sup>r</sup>. He was succeeded by Mithridates, on whom Augustus bestowed the kingdom of Commagene, though no-ways related to the deceased king, as a reward for his services during the war with Antony and Cleopatra. Mithridates the king's brother was excluded from the throne, for having sided with Antony<sup>c</sup>. Upon the death of Mithridates, Augustus suffered Antiochus II. the son of Antiochus I. to take possession of his father's kingdom. He died in the reign of Tiberius, and upon his death great disturbances arising between the nobles and the people, the latter demanding a king, and the former desiring to be governed by a magistrate sent them from Rome, Tiberius complied with the request of the nobles, and appointed Q. Servius to govern Commagene in quality of prætor<sup>d</sup>. But Caligula restored the kingdom of Commagene to Antiochus the son of Antiochus II. adding to it the maritime parts of Cilicia. He defeated the Cilicians, who refused to acknowledge him for their king, and took Trosobor their ringleader prisoner. He assisted Vespasian against Vitellus, and served under Titus at the siege of Jerusalem; but being afterwards suspected of holding a private correspondence with the Parthians, he was taken prisoner by Cesennius, and sent in chains to the emperor Vespasian, who banished him to Lacedæmon; but afterwards suffered him to lead a private life at Rome. Antiochus left two sons, viz. Antiochus and Callinicus, and one daughter, named Jotape. Antiochus, surnamed Epiphanes, served under Otho against Vitellius, and under Vespasian in his war with the Jews, and distinguished himself at the siege of Jerusalem. Callinicus is mentioned by Josephus<sup>e</sup>, who tells us, that his sister Jotape was married to Alexander king of Lesis in Cilicia. But Vespasian, having reduced Commagene to the form of a Roman province, would not allow any of the sons of Antiochus to succeed him. This country was afterwards made part of the province called Augustophratenensis, or as Amianus has it, Euphratenensis, and was commonly known by the name of Euphratesia.

CHALCIDENE, one of the most fruitful provinces of Syria, was bounded on the east by Chalybonitis; on the west by Antiochis; on the south by Apamene and Cæle-Syria; and on the north by Cyrrhestica. It was called Chalcidene from the city of Chalcis, the metropolis of the province, situated at the foot of mount Libanus. This province was seized by Ptolemy the son of Mennæus, during the troubles of Syria, and by him made a separate kingdom. Ptolemy himself is styled by Josephus <sup>w</sup> and Hegesippus <sup>x</sup> only prince of Chalcis; but his son Lysanias is honoured both by Josephus <sup>y</sup> and Dion <sup>z</sup> with the title of king. Upon the death of Antiochus Dionysius king of Syria, he attempted to make himself master of Damascus and all Cæle-Syria; but the inhabitants, having an utter aversion to him on account of his cruelty and wickedness, chose rather to submit to Aretas king of Arabia, by whom Antiochus and his whole army had been cut off <sup>a</sup>. He opposed Pompey on his entering Syria, but was by him defeated, taken prisoner, and sentenced to death; which, however, he escaped, by paying to Pompey a thousand talents <sup>b</sup>, who left him also in the possession of his kingdom. After Aristobulus king of Judæa had been poisoned by the friends of Pompey, and Alexander his son beheaded at Antioch, as we shall relate in the history of the Jews, he sent Philippion his son to Askalon, whither the widow of Aristobulus had retired with her other children, to bring them all to Chalcis, proposing, as he was in love with one of the daughters, named Alexandria, to maintain them in his own kingdom in a manner suitable to their rank; but Philippion likewise falling in love with Alexandria, married her on the way, for which Ptolemy put him to death on his return, and then married her himself <sup>c</sup>. By reason of this affinity he assisted, to the utmost of his power, Antigonus, the younger son of Aristobulus, who, being thus assisted by him, took the field at the head of a considerable army; but, on his first entering Judæa, was intirely defeated by Herod <sup>d</sup>. Ptolemy soon after died, and was succeeded by his son Lysanias, who, espousing the cause

THE account of their dispersion and condition to this present time we shall give in an appendix.

BUT, before we pass to the first section, it will be convenient to premise some few things concerning the state of the Jews during this new epoch; for from this time they are no more to be looked upon as that free, rich, and glorious people, which they had been, either under their former theocracy, as Josephus rightly terms it<sup>a</sup>, or under their opulent and warlike monarchs, and the direction of their prophets. Their condition, government, manners, their very name, and every thing but their religion, is now intirely changed ! And indeed it could hardly be expected otherwise, when we consider that those that had been carried away into Babylon were sold for slaves, and dispersed far and wide through that vast empire, according to the custom of those conquerors; and though some of them we find to have attained to very considerable posts<sup>b</sup>, or grown exceeding rich in the land of their captivity, yet these were but few, in comparison of those who groaned under the heavy hand of their oppressors<sup>c</sup>. Neither was it the former, but the latter, that is, the poorer sort, that came back into Judæa; and even of these, the whole amount of all that came, either with Zerubbabel, Ezra, or Nehemiah, did scarcely come up to seventy thousand; among whom a multitude of strangers was likewise intermixed, either by marriages, or otherwise, most of them so indigent, that they were forced to be supported in their journey by the charitable contributions of those that stayed behind.

THEY were indeed to be governed by their own laws; but as they still continued in subjection to other nations, to the Persians, Egyptians, Syrians, and Romans, that privilege, as well as the exercise of their religion, did very much depend on the arbitrary will of their conquerors, and was often curtailed, and sometimes wholly taken away. Even whilst they were under the Persians, the lives and estates of the whole nation were on the brink of being sacrificed to the ambition of a favourite Haman, had not Esther's interest miraculously prevented the execution of that bloody edict<sup>d</sup>; and so weak did they continue under them, that they were a long time exposed to the injuries of even the neighbouring Samaritans. They seem, however, to have recovered themselves by degrees, and to have lived in more peace and plenty during the two following centuries; and that is perhaps the reason of that vast chasm of near two hundred and fifty years in their history, between the death of Nehemiah and the times of the Maccabees, when those glorious heroes not only shook off the foreign yoke, but raised the glory of their nation by their victories and conquests, and by obliging other nations to embrace the Jewish religion. But this epocha was but short-lived, and eighty years were hardly expired, before the ungovernable ambition of some of their unworthy successors introduced a general apostacy, and brought them under such subjection to the Romans, as they could never more shake off. Herod indeed, whom these raised to the royal dignity, did greatly increase the glory and opulence of the Jewish nation; but as he was an Idumæan, who had gained the crown by the destruction of the Asmonean race, as he was a vassal to the Romans, and a tyrant of the Jews, they could neither be said to be free or happy during his hateful reign, much less under those of his successors, when the government of Judæa was split into so many toparchies; so that the nation went from thenceforward from bad to worse, till their total destruction. We observed that they were changed in their very name; that of Israelites was quite lost, as well as those of all the other tribes, which were absorbed into that of Judah. So that from their return they were chiefly known by the name of Jews, in opposition to the Samaritans, who were a mongrel mixture, partly of the ten tribes, partly of revolted Jews, and of other nations, as the sequel will soon shew. Religion was the only thing that received the least change since their re-establishment, and, if we except some apostacies, occasioned by persecutions, or the ambition of some of their high-priests, we shall find them in the sequel more averse to idolatry and all heathenish superstitions, than ever their fore-fathers had been prone to them before the captivity ; such strict observers of the sabbath, as to suffer themselves to be murdered by whole armies, rather than violate it by standing on their defence ; in a word, so zealous for their religion, and such strict observers of their oaths, whether of allegiance or confederacy, as to suffer the most bloody persecutions and horrid butcheries, with the utmost courage and constancy, rather than to violate their laws or fidelity. This is indeed a virtue, which, as Josephus rightly observes, was peculiar to the Jews<sup>c</sup>, and which no other nation or religion could ever lay any claim to, till the sufferings, number, and constancy of the christian martyrs did, in a great measure, eclipse the glory of the Jewish ones. We have already seen several instances of these last in a former volume, but shall find them still more frequent in the sequel of their history.

AS soon as the seventy years captivity, pronounced by Cyrus's Jeremiah against this rebellious people <sup>a</sup>, were fully accomplished (A), God was pleased to raise up the Year of great the Flood, 2463.

Before
Christ,
536.

(A) These seventy years are differently computed ; some begin them from the fourth of Jehoiakim, when the first Jewish captives were carried away by Nebuchadnezzar (1), and end them at the first issuing of Cyrus's decree. Others from the words of Zechariah (2) place the beginning of it at the destruction of Jerusalem, and its conclusion at the publication of Darius's decree for the building of the temple, and restoring liberty to the Jews.

Both computations may be justly maintained, and may have even been designed by Jeremiah, since between either of the two epochs there are just seventy years, and the latter begins and ends just eighteen years after the former.

For as the captivity which began in the fourth of Jehoiakim, could not be said to be completed till the total destruction of the city and Jewish monarchy ; so neither could their deliverance, be-great Cyrus to the throne ; who, in the very first year of his reign, issued out that decree in favour of them, of which an account has been given in a former volume *. By this edict they were not only permitted to return to their own land, which that prince had doubtless beheld in some late expedition, lying desolate and barren, though naturally fertile (B) ; but also to rebuild their temple at Jerusalem, re-gun at the first decree of Cyrus, be said to be completed till the fourth year of Darius, which confirmed and put it in full vigour and execution.

We may still reckon a third method or stage of computing these seventy years, which answers in the same exactness with the two former ; namely, from the twenty-third year of Nebuchadnezzar, when Nebuzaradan carried off all the remainder of the conquered Jews ; at which time the captivity was completed to all intents ; and the full restoration of their temple worship, at the solemn dedication of the new temple, and their celebrating the first passover immediately after it in the seventh year of Darius's reign ; when, and not till then, was fully completed the end of their thralldom, and the Jewish religion restored to its antient splendor and regularity. All these the reader may see fully demonstrated by the learned Prideaux in the place last quoted.

However the words of the prophecy before us, we own, seem to fix the epocha according to the first of these stages ; though those of Zechariah do more plainly belong to the last, as will be shewn in its due time (3).

(B) We have shewn in a former volume †, that the Jews were obliged by the Mosaic law to let their lands lie fallow every seventh year (4) ; but this had been neglected for a considerable time ; for which God caused it to lie desolate and uncultivated, till it had recovered that full respite, of which that rebellious nation had deprived it (5).

If therefore we reckon the whole seventy sabbatic years to be here implied, it will follow, that the omission of this law began even before the time of David, or even of Samuel ; but it is scarce credible, that it should have been suffered under the government of two such pious persons ; whereas, if we date the desolation of the land from the murder of Gedaliah, at which time those few Jews that were left there fled into Egypt ; to this first year of Cyrus, the number of sabbatic years will be just fifty two, and will carry us new the divine worship, and transport thither all the sacred utensils which Nebuchadnezzar had brought away from thence. These last he ordered to be delivered by Mithredath, his high treasurer, to Sheshbazzar, whom we take to be the same with Zerubbabel (C), who, being the grandson of Jehoiakim, or Jechoniah, king of Judah, was then the first prince of the royal blood, and was therefore appointed head governor of Judæa, under the title of Tirshatha <sup>b</sup>. He likewise gave directions concerning the dimensions of the temple, which was to be sixty cubits in height and breadth, built upon a strong foundation, with three rows of great stones, and a row of timber; the expence of the whole to be furnished out of the king's house <sup>c</sup>; to all these the king added a full permission to all the Jews that were so disposed to return into Judæa, and to those who preferred staying behind, free liberty to contribute, as liberally as they pleased, gold, silver, or any other precious stuffs, towards the building and adorning that sacred edifice, and the renewing and carrying on the worship of God there <sup>d</sup>.

back three hundred and sixty four years, that is, to about the beginning of Asa's reign, from which time the people began to be very remiss in this and many other particulars of the Mosaic law (6).

(C) It is likely, that the first was his Babylonish name (7, it being customary for those conquerors to change the names of their captives, as we find they did those of some of the latter kings of Judah (8), as well as those of Daniel and his three companions (9). As to the title of Tirshatha, or Hatirshatha, though some derive it from the Chaldee, חַרְשָׁתָּה dispensator potus, or a cup-bearer, such as Nehemiah seems to have been to Artaxerxes; yet it is most likely, that the word implied some high dignity, such as a governor, lord lieutenant, a deputy, and the like; for such was here our Sheshbazzar or Zerubbabel.

The vessels that were delivered to him by the king's order, were, according to Ezra (10), thirty chargers of gold, a thousand chargers of silver, thirty basons of gold, four hundred and ten of silver, twenty nine knives, besides many others, amounting in all to five thousand four hundred; but these were not all that had been carried out of Jerusalem; the rest were afterwards brought thither by Nehemiah.

IMMEDIATELY upon the publishing of this edict, the chiefs of the tribes of Judah and Benjamin, together with the priests and Levites, assembled themselves; and as many as retained still a love for their country and a zeal for the God of Israel, disposed themselves to return to that once happy land. As for the rest, which were the far greater number, who preferred the land of Babylon to it, they contented themselves with furnishing their returning brethren with gold, silver, cattle, and other conveniencies, either for their journey, or for the building of the temple and city. At the head of these were Zerubbabel mentioned above, and Jeshua the high-priest (D). The next in rank were Nehemiah and Mordecai (E), Serajah, Reelajah, Bilsham, Mispar, Bigvai, Rehum, and Baanah, who were all heads of families, and assistants to Zerubbabel in the re-establishment of the Jewish affairs both in church and state<sup>e</sup>. The rest amounted to about forty two thousand three hundred and sixty, including those that came afterwards with Nehemiah, besides their servants and slaves of both sexes, which were in all seven thousand three hundred and thirty seven<sup>f</sup>. Neither were they all of the tribes of Levi, Judah, and Benjamin, though from that time they were all blended together under the name of Jehudim, or Jews; for many of those of the other ten tribes, which had been formerly carried away by Tiglath-pilezer, Shalmanezzer, and Ezrahaddon, and had still preserved the true worship of God, took the advantage of the king's edict to return into the land of their forefathers. To these we may add a great number, who had formerly gone from the idolatrousten tribes to put themselves under the protection of the kings of Judah<sup>g</sup>; and this may be the reason why the whole number of those mentioned in Ezra's list, amounts but to twenty nine thousand eight hundred and eighteen, and to thirty one thousand and thirty one in that of Nehemiah; whereas both these historians make the sum total to be forty two thousand three hundred and sixty; so that the overplus seems to be added from those of the other ten tribes, which returned with those of Judah and Benjamin (F). We find likewise mention made of two hundred men and women singers, whom they brought with them, four hundred and thirty five camels, seven hundred and thirty six horses, two hundred and forty five mules, and six thousand seven hundred and twenty asses<sup>h</sup>.

(D) This office belonged to him by a lineal descent, he being the son of Jozadack (11), whose father Seraiah, high-priest at the taking of Jerusalem, had been put to death at Riblah (12). As for Jozadack, he was carried captive into Babylon, and had been dead some time before the publishing of this decree, so that Jeshua was then the head of the pontifical family.

(E) Some think these two to be the same with those so often mentioned in the books of Esther and Nehemiah, and that finding the work of the temple obstructed by their enemies, they returned again to Shushan (13); but it is generally believed, that they were quite different persons of the same name (14).

As for the other seven, the Jewish writers affirm them to have been the chiefs of the Jewish synagogue, or grand council of the Jews, which they say did sit at Jerusalem after their return from Babylon (15). We shall have occasion to speak more largely of this synagogue in the sequel of this chapter.

ONE may see by this list, how small the number was of those who returned, in comparison of those who stayed behind; neither must we be much surprised at it; for if even their forefathers, who were brought with so many wonders out of the furnace of Egypt were almost continually plotting to return thither, what could be expected from their sordid offspring, but that the far greater part of them would prefer the place of their captivity, where they were possessed of lands, houses, and money, to that of Palestine, which had lain so long desolate? And accordingly the Jews themselves tell us<sup>i</sup>,

(F) Accordingly we find the decree of Cyrus, and afterwards that of Artaxerxes, extended not to those two tribes only, but to all the people of the God of Israel, and to all those that worshipped God at Jerusalem, which could not but include all the other ten (16).

In consequence of which Ezra concludes the chapter in which the above-mentioned list is, with these remarkable words; So the priests, levites, people, singers, porters, and nethinims, dwelt in their cities, and all Israel in their cities. And when he speaks of the expiatory sacrifices which were offered at Jerusalem, he mentions expressly twelve he goats according to the number of the tribes of Israel (17).

Priests that returned. that only the bran came out of Babylon, but that the flour staid behind; even of the priests, who, as we observed in the former part of their history *, were divided into twenty four classes, only four of these returned, namely those of Jedajah, Immer, Pashur, and Harim. These however soon after their arrival, subdivided themselves each into six, that they might again make up the old number, and called themselves by their names accordingly † (G). Some of these there were, who not being able to make out their lineal descent from the priesthood, were deprived of the office and privileges of it until some high-priest should arise who could decide their title by the urim and thummim ‡. The same dispute happened also concerning some others, who being come from Telmela, Telharfa (H), and other places, could not prove themselves to belong to any tribe §. These were about six hundred and fifty in number, besides upwards of three hundred and ninety nethinims, the posterity of those Gibeonites whom Solomon did afterwards dedicate to the service of the temple †; so small was the number of those of unquestionable descent, who returned either with Zerubbabel or Nehemiah. And hence it is, that ever since this time the number of Jews that dwelt in Palestine, was always vastly inferior to those that were dispersed in Chaldea, Persia, &c. The priests, levites, singers, nethinims, and other officers of the temple settled themselves as well as they could in or near Jerusalem, that they might more readily vacate on the service of God, by rearing up his altar, and preparing all other things against the next grand solemnity; as for the rest, the greater part of them dispersed themselves in the neighbouring cities and country, where some of them had formerly dwelt, and

(G) Hence it is that Zachariah the father of John the Baptist is said (18) to have been of the course of Abiah, and Matthias the Maccabee to have been of that of Joarib (19), though 'tis plain neither of them, nor any other but the four above-mentioned, returned into Judæa.

where they probably found also some of their brethren whom Nebuchadnezzar had left there.

By this time the month Tishri, which, as we have elsewhere shewn ††, was the first of the civil, and seventh of the ecclesiastical year, was at hand. The first day of it was the feast of the trumpets, because the new year was to be proclaimed by the sound of that instrument <sup>a</sup>. It ushered in moreover two other great solemnities, namely the expiation day, or grand fast, which was to be kept on the tenth <sup>o</sup>, and the feast of tabernacles, which begun on the fifteenth, and ended on the the twenty second of the month <sup>p</sup> inclusive.
The greatest part of that of expiation, such as the high-priest entering on that day into the most holy place, &c. they were forced to set aside for want of a temple; however they failed not to come from all parts to the solemnity, and to fast, pray, Expiation &c. and to offer the proper sacrifices on the altar, which they fast.
had by this time repaired, so that from this day they ceased not to offer the morning and evening, and all other sacrifices prescribed by the law of Moses. The feast of tabernacles coming five days after that of expiation, they erected them booths Feast of ta- at Jerusalem, and celebrated that festival with the usual solemnities, and so set about in good earnest to restore the worship bernacles of God in that metropolis. celebrated

In this solemn assembly, it was resolved to set about the rebuilding of the temple, towards which every one chearfully contributed according to their power; the whole amounted to sixty one thousand drachms of gold, and five thousand minas of silver (I), besides one hundred vestments for the priests to

Ibid. p. 179.

(I) Every drachm of gold being computed to be worth about ten shillings of our money, and every mina of silver, about nine pounds sterling, the whole amounted to seventy five thousand five hundred pounds. This was indeed a great sum, if we suppose it to have been all contributed by that small number of poor people just returned from a long captivity; and therefore it is generally thought, that it included likewise the offerings of those who staid behind, and who, as we have seen above, did all contribute largely towards it; but then this sum will appear vastly too short, considering the vast number, richness, and usual munificence of those that staid; besides, it is scarcely to be supposed, that had this been the whole that had been collected both in and out of Palestine, they would have so readily set about so magnificent a building;
for which several millions would scarcely have sufficed.

It seems therefore more probable to us, that this collection was officiate in. This was indeed a small sum toward such a vast and expensive undertaking ; and therefore we do suppose it to have been a free-will addition of their own, to a much greater one which had been contributed by their brethren, who chose to stay in the places of their dispersion. This money was put into the hands of proper officers, who were to oversee the work, who immediately hired workmen, sent to Tyre and Sydon for cedars from Libanus, pursuant to Cyrus's decree, and employed the first year in preparing the materials for the building <sup>9</sup>.

IN the second month of the following year, which was the third of Cyrus's reign, and the second from their return, they began to lay the foundation of the temple with great solemnity, in the presence of Zerubbabel their governor, of Jeshua the high-priest, and of the whole congregation. It was accompanied with the sound of their trumpets, and other musical instruments, the priests and musicians singing some psalms proper to the occasion, and all the people shouting for joy at the laying of the first stones. But whilst the younger sort were thus expressing their joyful zeal upon this occasion, many of the priests, levites, and heads of families, who had seen that famous building in its splendor fifty three years before, could not forbear sending the loudest cries of grief at the sight of that which they were now going to build ; insomuch that the acclamations of the one, and the sighs and groans of the other, were so intermixed, that it was not easy to distinguish them from each other <sup>r</sup> (K).

raised among them who returned, and were then at Jerusalem ; and consequently, that though the bulk of them might be as poor as the Jewish writers make them, yet there were some considerable ones, who were both opulent and liberal enough, to add this offering of seventy five thousand five hundred pounds to that which had been contributed by their brethren abroad, and which was thought sufficient to set about that noble edifice.

(K) That there was a real and even considerable disparity between the old and new temple, is very certain, since God is pleased to comfort them for it, and to promise to raise the glory of the latter above that of the former by the presence of the Messiah (20).

This difference however cannot be understood of its largeness, since the new was built upon the foundation of the old. Of the (20) Haggai ii. 3. & seq.

WHILST the work was carrying on, the Samaritans (L) came to Zerubbabel, and the Jewish congregation, and expressed two the decree of Cyrus seems to allow this new one three times the breadth of that of Solomon; that being but twenty, and this sixty cubits broad (21); but our learned Prideaux has sufficiently proved that the dimensions were the same, only differently taken, viz. the one from in to in, and the other from out to out.

The Jews indeed tell us, that the second temple wanted five considerable things, which were the chief glory of the first (22); and these were, 1st, the ark or mercy-seat: 2. the divine presence, called by them the Shekinah: 3. the holy fire upon the altar: 4. the urim and thummim: and lastly, the spirit of prophecy. And they are certainly in the right; but then it doth not appear from the sacred historian, that these were the things which the Jewish elders bewailed, at the foundation of this second temple (23).

It seems therefore probable, that their grief did arise from the unlikelihood that it would ever be raised to the grandeur and magnificence of the old one, seeing the one had been built by the wisest and richest king, and constantly adorned by some one or other of his posterity; the other was now begun by some few exiles just returned from their captivity: the one in the time of profound peace, and greatest opulence; the other in time of adversity and oppression from their enemies round about: the former was built of the most curious and costly stones, and timber, and other materials wrought with the most exquisite art, and overlaid with a prodigious quantity of gold; insomuch that the overlayings of the most holy place, which was but thirty foot square every way, is said to have amounted to six hundred talents of gold (24), that is, to four millions three hundred and twenty thousand pounds sterling. What likelihood therefore was there, that this, which was mostly built of the materials that were dug up out of the ruins of the former would ever come up to it? Lastly, there were in the old one many sumptuous galleries, buildings, gates and other ornaments, which were not in this, nor were added to it till Herod's time, that is, about five hundred years after, as shall be seen in its proper place.

(L) These were not of the seed of Israel, but the posterity of that mixed multitude, whom Shalmanezzer, king of Affyria, sent from Cutbab, Ava, Hamath, Sepharvaim, and other provinces, to inhabit those parts, out of which he had carried the ten Israelitish tribes, as we have seen in a former volume †; they therefore took the name of Samaritans from Samaria the capital of that kingdom, but pressed an earnest desire to join their assistance in it, seeing they had worshipped the same God ever since the time of E-sarhaddon king of Assyria, who had settled them there. But whether the Jews suspected the sincerity of their offer, or out of contempt to a people who were not of the seed of Israel, but only imperfect worshippers of God; Jeshua, Zerubbabel, and the whole congregation, refused to let them bear any part in the undertaking, alledging, that the decree of Cyrus being only directed to those who were of Israelitish descent, it would be a dishonour to their nation to admit any strangers to be partners in the work<sup>r</sup>. Whether this refusal was really justifiable or not we will not pretend to determine, since the scripture doth no where either praise or discommend it (M). Sure it is, that it proved the source of a bitter and irreconcilable by the Jews they were called Cuthim from Cuthah, one of the provinces out of which they came (25).

These had, soon after their settlement in and about Samaria, been taught the worship of the true God, but they likewise retained, each of them, the worship of their own gods, so that their religion was a mixture of judaism and heathenism. Samaria having been then totally destroyed by Shalmanezzer according to the prophecy (26), they did not think fit to rebuild it, but went and dwelt at Shichem, near mount Gerizim, and made it their capital (27).

However they seem to have rebuilt and repeopled the old city, at least in some degree, by that time the Jews were returned from Babylon, since both Ezra (28) and Nehemiah (29) make mention of the inhabitants of Samaria, and in this situation they were when they came to offer their assistance to Zerubbabel.

(M) The Jews, out of their innate hatred to the Samaritans, do one and all commend the zeal of that assembly, in refusing to admit them to the work; and they think that the resentment which that people shewed immediately after, is a sufficient token of the insincerity of their offer, especially seeing they are said nowhere to have forsaken the old worship of their country gods. We do not know of one christian commentator that hath not given into this Jewish notion, or has been at the pains to examine this refusal in a different light, notwithstanding its having proved so fatal to them, and so detrimental to their religion.

We shall therefore for once take the liberty to inquire how far

(25) 2 Kings xvii 23. & seq. (26) Mic. i. 6. (27) Joseph. antiq. lib. xi. c. 8. (28) Chap. iv. 17. (29) Chap. iv. 2. & al.

irreconcilable hatred between these two nations, the sad effects of which the Jews soon felt in the immediate obstruction they may be justly blamed for this refusal, and so be answerable for all that long train of mischiefs it brought after it.

First, then, the sacred historian doth no where intimate, that they came to offer their assistance out of any hostile design, which he would scarcely have omitted, had that been the case ; but plainly tells us, that they came and offered their assistance to the Jews. It is true, he calls them the adversaries of the Jews, for such they became when rejected by them ; but it proves not that they were so before ; besides, we have shewn heretofore, that the word צַר Tzar, here used, doth often signify a rival or competitor *, and may be as capable of a good sense as of a bad one, and why not in this case ?

For the Samaritans had been long since instructed and initiated in the law of Moses, and been worshippers of the God of Israel ; and as for the idolatries which their forefathers had intermixed with it, we think it more than probable, that they had long since forsaken them, upon reading the severe prohibitions that are interspersed in the pentateuch, which they had in their hands. This seems beyond dispute, not only from the confession they made before the Jewish congregation (30), but also from their constant behaviour, even after their rupture with the Jews, since we do not find them any where taxed with idolatry, nor find the least monument or relic of it, though in every thing else diametrically opposite to the Jewish nation ; though, if this had been the case, the admitting of them into their commonwealth, and partnership in the work, might probably have proved an effectual means of curing them of it ; and it was indeed their duty to endeavour it, because,

2dly, The law of Moses obliged them to incorporate into their church and state all, except two or three nations therein excepted, that would become circumcised, and observers of the law (31). And might it not be in right of this law, that the converted Samaritans claimed their admittance into the work, especially since,

3dly, As servants of the God of Israel, they knew that after the temple was once rebuilt, they would be equally obliged with the Jews to come and worship there, and there only ; and if they were thus equally intitled to and desirous of enjoying the benefit of the temple, why might they not be equally zealous to contribute towards the rebuilding of it ? There could be then no just pretence for excluding them, since even heathens were allowed to send their offerings both to the temple, and for maintaining the divine worship there. Now, is it not more than probable, that if the stiff Jews had admitted them to any share in the undertaking, though it had on of their undertakings, and by numberless ill offices, which the incensed Samaritans did to them, and of which we shall give a further account in the sequel of this chapter.

been only to contribute towards the charges of rebuilding; they might have found them as hearty friends to them, as their haughty refusal made them enemies?

We have seen in a former volume how Josiah, one of the best kings that ever reigned in Judah, thought these nations worthy to be invited to the solemnities which were celebrated at Jerusalem, and with what zeal he destroyed all the idolatrous monuments that were in that kingdom (32); and was not his example very well worth imitating, especially at this juncture?

If it be asked how this zeal of the Samaritans, if it had been sincere, came to be so soon turned into the bitterest rancour, we need not now go far to seek for an answer. It is plain, first they thought themselves unjustly used by their refusal, since even the law of Moses condemned it; and in the next place, the Jews answer was couched in such haughty and contemptuous terms, as plainly gave them to understand, that if ever they came to be again masters of themselves, instead of being looked upon as brethren, and servants of the same God, they must expect to be used with the same heavy hand as the Canaanites and other conquered nations had been by the former kings of Judah and Israel. It was natural therefore for them to use all proper endeavours to prevent it, which they did; by opposing all their measures to the utmost of their power; and their first step was to obstruct the rebuilding of the temple, which the Jews resenting and retaliating, the enmity improved to such a degree, that no two nations ever hated or were more cruel to each other upon all occasions, than the Jews and the Samaritans. All which might in all probability have been prevented, had the former complied at least in some measure with the request of the latter.

Upon the whole then we think, that instead of commending them for their zeal, we may much more reasonably look upon all the misfortunes which the Samaritans made them suffer, to have been sent them as a punishment for their uncharitableness.

The only thing we can see may be objected against what has been said is, that the Jewish congregation had some inspired persons among them, such as the prophets Haggai and Zechariah (33), whom they probably consulted before they gave a definitive answer to the Samaritans; and if so, their refusal must have been conformable to the will of God. But the text doth no-where say they did consult them; and they might indeed do as Joshua had formerly done with respect to the Gibeonites (34), think the case too plain

(32) Vid. 2 Kings xxiii pass. 2 Chron. xxxiv. ult. xxxv. pass. Vid. & sup. Vol. IV. p. 98, & seq. (33) Exra v. 1. (34) Josh. ix. 14.

THE first step the repulsed Samaritans took to obstruct the work, since they knew they could not procure a reversion of the king's decree, was to bribe underhand some of his head ministers and officers, to represent the Jews as a rebellious nation, and their rebuilding the temple as dangerous, and tending to shake off their obedience to him. They failed not to carry their point, and the work was accordingly stopped, in a great measure, not only during the remaining five years of Cyrus's life, but also during the reign of his successor (N) ; however, to require it ; and so forgetting that charity which the Mosaic law commands towards its proselytes **, they might only listen to their natural contempt for all that were not of the seed of Israel ; however that be, that event shews this their refusal to have been the unhappy source of endless evils, in which the Jews did almost constantly bear the bigger share, as the sequel will soon shew.

(N) This suppression of the work is supposed to have given occasion to Daniel's three weeks fasting and praying, which we read of (35), in the third year of Cyrus's reign, and which began on the third day of the first month (36), and at the end of which he saw the famous vision of the Persian, Macedonian, and Roman empires, contained in the three last chapters of that prophet, and which seem to have been the last he ever had.

And indeed, if we compare what he says in the close of them, with his great age, it is reasonable to believe he did not outlive it long, since he was then in the seventy-third year of his captivity, to which if we add but fifteen, the age he was of when carried into Babylon, and less than that he cannot be supposed to have been, he must then have been near ninety years old ; however, whether he died when we suppose him, or lived any time longer, we hear no more of him, except in the talmudic writings.

What the Jews opinion is, concerning him and his writings, has been seen in a former volume †. But Ezekiel, and even Josephus, give him much the preference to the other prophets (37) ; and what is of more weight than all, our saviour himself (38) acknowledges him to have been a prophet ; and if the Jews since then had not been fatally blinded, they must have been forced to own that they had found him a very true one to their cost. But this will best be seen in the sequel of their history.

In the mean time we cannot forbear observing, concerning his prophecies, whether those that relate to the Messiah, or to those foreign empires above-mentioned, that they are the clearest and

however, while Cyrus lived, the Jews did still keep on gathering materials for the work, in hopes of better times; they were still assisted in it by the Tyrians and Sidonians, who furnished them with cedars from Libanus, with matons, carpenters, and other workmen; and these being as it were pent up in their maritime cities, received in return a proportionable quantity of corn, wine, and oil from the Jews, as their ancestors had formerly done from king Solomon <sup>c</sup>. But Cyrus was no sooner dead, than the Samaritans, encouraged by the ill disposition of his successor Cambyfes, called in scriptur e Ahasuerus <sup>d</sup>, instead of their former subdulous practices, declared themselves openly against the Jews, and against their undertaking; and writ in the most pressing terms to that monarch to put an immediate stop to it. Cambyfes however, probably out of respect to his father's decree, would not seem to revoke it, but privately gave them leave to obstruct the execution of it, so that the work, tho' it was not wholly suppressed, went at least very heavily on during his whole reign, which lasted but seven years and five months.

most circumstantiate of any; insomuch that Josephus, in the place above quoted, rightly observes, that he did not only foretel future events, as the rest of the prophets did, but did also determine the time in which they should come to pass.

And this wonderful agreement between the facts when accomplished, and the prophecies that foretold them, appeared so exact and irrefragable, that Porphyry could no other way elude the force of it, than by supposing the latter to have been written after the former (39).

Besides those prophecies of his, which were originally written, partly in Hebrew, and partly in Chaldee, the Latin version has some other pretended pieces of his, which were, however, never admitted by the Jews into their canon, and are therefore thrown out by the protestants among the apocrypha; of this kind are the History of Susanna, of Bel and the dragon, &c. concerning which the reader may see all that is worth knowing in the authors quoted in the margin (40).

Cambyfes

Cambyfes being dead, and one of the magi having mounted the throne (C), as has been elsewhere related *, the Samaritans failed not to renew their accusation against the Jews to that usurper; they represented to him, that that nation had been always famed for rebellion, for the truth of which they appealed to ancient records; and added, that if they were suffered to go on in the rebuilding of their city and temple, which they were then about, they would not be long ere they shook off the yoke, and refused to pay him either tribute or obedience, and that their example might soon be followed by other provinces on that side of the Euphrates, and occasion a general revolt. The usurper, who had been one of the chiefs of the sect of the magi, against whom the Jews were known to be diametrically opposite in point of religion, did not want any great arguments to induce him to suppress them, but sent an immediate decree to them to desist from their enterprize, and charged the Samaritans to see it executed. These therefore, having received the order, went straitway with it to Jerusalem, and by virtue of it caused a total stop to be put to it, till the Jews obtained a fresh decree in the second year of Darius his successor's reign, that is, about two years after.

THE Jews by that time had been so disheartened, partly by the constant opposition of the Samaritans, and partly by this last decree, that tho' this last ceased with the discovery and death of the usurper, yet did they not shew the least readiness to resume their enterprize, till God had punished their indolence with a great dearth, and let them know by his prophet Haggai, that it was upon that account that both their harvest and vintage had failed them w. This was indeed an effectual argument to awake the zeal of that selfish people, who had by this time taken care to seat themselves in commodious and sumptuous houses, without giving themselves any further thought about the house of God. The prophet was therefore sent to the governor, to the high-priest, and to the rest of the heads of Judah, to upbraid them with their ingratitude *, and at the same time to assure them, that if they would now set about the work in good earnest, God would not only make it prosper in their hands, but that he would make the glory of this second temple to exceed by far that of the first <sup>v</sup>. IN the mean time the Samaritans, who kept a watchful eye over them, being surprized that they should dare to go to work again, in spite of the decree they had obtained against them, went and applied themselves to Tatnai, whom Darius had made governor of Syria and Palestine, and acquainted him, that this enterprize was resumed, not only against the king's order, but to the manifest detriment of his realm; they expected, probably, that this new governor would have immediately suppressed that work; but he being a man of more temper and moderation, came directly to Jerusalem accompanied with some of his counsellors, and with one Shetharboznai, who is supposed to have been governor of Samaria, and enquired of the Jews by what authority they ventured upon that work. Zerubbabel and Jeshua undertook to answer for the rest, and acquainted him with the decree they had formerly obtained from Cyrus, and at the same time produced the sacred vessels which that monarch had ordered to be restored to them in order to renew the worship of God in Jerusalem. Tatnai, having received this answer, thought the matter of too great consequence to interfere with, till he had sent a full account of it to Darius, and desired that search might be made concerning that decree. It was accordingly found among the records that were kept in the palace of Ec-batan *, where Cyrus was at the time of his granting it, and Darius out of respect to that great monarch, two of whose daughters he had then married, readily confirmed it by a new one, in which all the grants of the old were repeated and ratified, with this severe penalty annexed, that whosoever should presume to contravene or obstruct it, his house should be pulled down, and a gallows made of the timber of it, and the offender hanged upon it. The execution of the decree was committed to Tatnai and Shetharboznai, and was brought to them accordingly much about the beginning of the fourth

It was then that the building began to rise apace, since they were now not only free from any obstructions from their enemies, but were supplied by the king's order, with all necessities towards the expence of it, out of the treasury of that province; and this addition of the king's bounty, joined to the offerings which both they of Palestine and their brethren abroad paid towards it, caused such a dispatch in the work, that it was compleatly finished in three years, that is, in the sixth year of Darius, and in the month Adar, which is the last of the Jewish year, answering in part to our February <sup>b</sup>. The dedication of that sacred building was celebrated with suitable solemnity and joy, and with abundance of sacrifices; after which they prepared themselves likewise for the approaching festival of the passover, to which many of their brethren from other provinces assisted, having heard of the success which that long-wished-for enterprize had met with; and from this time we reckon the complete restoration of the Jews mentioned in the first note of this chapter. Accordingly, when those that dwelt in Babylon sent about this time to Jerusalem to enquire of the prophets, whether they might not thenceforward desist from keeping the fasts of the fifth and seventh months (Q), Zachariah, among other things contained in the seventh and eighth chapters of his prophecies, tells them, that they had now kept those fasts seventy years <sup>c</sup>. In memory of this decree, which, we observed, was given from Shushan or Susa, the Jews gave the name of Shushan to the eastern gate of the outward temple wall, and caused a bas-relief of that metropolis to be set up over it, which continued there till its total destruction by the Romans <sup>d</sup>.

(P) The learned Usher seems to place this decree one year sooner, but if we consider that it was about the beginning of the third year of that monarch, that Tatnai sent to the king about it, one may reasonably allow six months for the messenger's going and coming from Jerusalem to Shushan in Persia, since, as we have seen a little higher, Ezra was four months in coming from Babylon; and less than another six months can hardly be allowed, before they could obtain, in so great a court, an order for searching the records, going from Shushan to Ecbatan, procuring an authentic copy of the decree, bringing it back to Darius, and obtaining a confirmation of it. (42).

(Q) These were fasts which the captive Jews kept in those two months in memory of, first, Jerusalem being first besieged by Nebuchadnezzar: Secondly, Of its being taken by him: Thirdly, Of its being burnt with the temple: And, Fourthly, for the murder of Gedaliah: All which fasts they still keep to this day, though they have somewhat changed their place in their calendar.

Samaritans refuse to pay to it.

IN the mean time, the mortification which the envious Samaritans received from the king's decree in favour of the Jews, and the wonderful dispatch with which they had finished their temple, did but serve to augment their rancour against them; their being obliged to pay, not only towards the rebuilding of that edifice, but towards the sacrifices and oblations that were daily to be offered up there, for the prosperity of the king and the whole realm, and towards the maintenance of the priests who officiated there<sup>e</sup>, was what they seemed to resent above all the rest; and therefore, as soon as the temple was finished, though the out-buildings were still unrepaired, and continued so for many years, they made it a pretence for withholding the usual tribute, pretending, that it was to cease as soon as the building was finished. This obliged the Jews to send a deputation to Darius, at the head of whom were Zerubbabel, Mordecai, and Ananias, to complain to the king of it. Darius received them with his usual benevolence, and after a full hearing issued out a fresh decree, commanding his officers at Samaria to cause the usual tribute to be paid to the temple, and for the future on no pretence whatever to give the Jews any cause of complaint upon that article<sup>f</sup>. After this they met with no further obstacle during the rest of that monarch's reign, which lasted twenty eight years longer, nor during the twelve years of his successor; but enjoyed a perfect peace, being governed by their high-priests in matters of religion, and in those of state by the heads of the tribe of Judah, though still in subjection to the kings of Persia, and subordinate to his governors on this side of the Euphrates (R). Xerxes had no sooner succeeded his father,

(R) These particulars we have from Josephus, who adds, that Zerubbabel was the person who answered the wise question proposed by the king, which we have in the apocryphal book of Baruch. But we scarce think it worth inserting here, tho' the same author tells than he confirmed all the privileges formerly granted to the Jews. This was not without a singular mark of the divine providence, since the temple of Jerusalem was the only one that obtained this particular regard from that prince, whilst he was plundering and destroying all the rest that came in his way. But he was in both cases fulfilling the prophecies of Isaiah<sup>s</sup> and Jeremiah<sup>h</sup>, which had long since foretold both the downfall of the heathen idols and temples, and the restoration of the Jewish one, under the protection and favour of Cyrus and his successors. Josephus adds from a passage out of an antient poet (S), that the Jews assisted Xerxes in his wars, and that he had a band of them in his army<sup>i</sup>. It is true, the meaning of the poet has been much canvassed by very Great critics, but whether or no he intended the Jews by it, it is hardly to be supposed, that they, who were so well known for their valour, fidelity, and attachment to that prince, should be the only people excused from the war, when his army was composed of all the other nations of the Persian empire. In the third year of his reign, according to the Alexandrian chronicle, died the Jewish high-priest Jeshua in the fifty-third year of his high-priesthood, and was succeeded by his son Joiakim<sup>k</sup>; and Xerxes, being murdered in the twenty-first year of his reign was succeeded by his third-son Artaxerxes, whom we have elsewhere shewn to have been the Abasuerus of scripture, the tells us, the rebuilding of the temple and the restoration of the Jews were granted him as a reward for his merit and judgment. The canonical books are silent as to all those particulars, and we shall stick close to them as far as they go.

(S) The passage is out of Chærilus, and is to this purpose: That a strange people, who used the Phœnician dialect, and dwelt in the high and hilly grounds of Solyma, near to a great lake, marched under his (Xerxes) standards. The Jews speaking then the Syriac language, Solyma being one of the names of Jerusalem, and its being situate upon hills, and near the famous lake Asphaltites, it was natural for Josephus to understand the people here mentioned to have been the Jews. Some great critics, however, (43) have pretended to apply it to the Solymi of Pisidia, against whom Salmasius has undertaken to vindicate the Jewish historian (44), who seems indeed to be most in the right.

husband of Esther †, and consequently the greatest friend the Jews ever had, either before or since their restoration.

Artaxerxes or Ahasuerus favours the Jews.

How he came to be so above all his predecessors, we chiefly learn from the book of Esther, whose history there related is so well known, that we shall content ourselves with giving our readers as short a summary of it as is necessary for the thread of our history. Esther or Hadaßab was an orphan of the tribe of Benjamin, brought up and adopted by her uncle Mordecai; this last was a descendant of those who had been brought captive into Babylon with Jeconiah king of Judah, and, by his constant attendance at the palace gate, seems to have been one of the king's porters. He had had interest enough to introduce his niece into the palace, among other beauties who were to be candidates to succeed the repudiated Vashti; and she had already so captivated the Persian monarch, even before he had set the diadem on her head, that she could obtain any thing from him, which her uncle bid her ask of him; it being a peculiar privilege of those virgins, whenever their turn came to appear before the king, to obtain whatever they asked of him<sup>1</sup>. It is therefore reasonably supposed, that it was by her interest that Ezra, a very learned and zealous Jew, of the house of Aaron (T), obtained an ample

(T) He calls himself here, according to the Hebrew idiom, the son of Seraiah (45), who was the high-priest, whom Nebuchadnezzar caused to be slain at the taking of Jerusalem (46); but had he been his real son, he must then have been at least a hundred and thirty two years old, supposing him to have been an infant when his father died (47), and so wholly unfit for such a journey and employ; whereas we find him capable of reading the scriptures to the people from morning to noon, one whole week, and of assisting Nehemiah in his office thirteen years after (48), when he must have been at least a hundred and forty-five years old.

But since he there also calls Azariah the son of Merajoth, though it appears from the book of the Chronicles (49), that there were six descendants between them, what should hinder, but he may himself have been some descents off Seraiah, though it doth not appear how many?

What reputation he was in at the Persian court, may be gathered from the commission itself, which is so extensive in favour of the

His commission.

AT his arrival he opened his commission before the whole Jewish assembly, and there delivered to the priests the offerings which had been made by the king, nobles, and by the Babylonish Jews (W); after which, having sent to acquaint the governor of Syria and Palestine with the power he had received from the king, he set about putting it in execution; he began with appointing judges and magistrates, to reform every thing that was contrary to the law of Moses, and, pursuant to his commission, empowered them to punish offenders, not only with fines, imprisonment, or other lesser punishments, but even with banishment and death, according to the nature of the crime <sup>o</sup>. Ezra continued in the faithful discharge of his authority thirteen years, that is, till he was succeeded by Nehemiah, who was sent thither with a fresh commission from the same monarch. But before that, the

Josephus passes by this whole affair, and is so out both in his chronology and history, that he makes this decree, as was that which Nehemiah obtained thirteen years after, to have been both granted by Xerxes, contrary to the Hebrew text, which calls him Artaxerxes; but this is not the only place where that historian is out.

(W) These offerings amounted to (1) a hundred talents of gold, besides twenty basons of gold, amounting to a thousand dar-konim (or darics, which were equivalent to our jacobus); (2) six hundred and fifty talents of silver, with vessels of silver, to the weight of a hundred talents more, and two vessels of some fine copper, then reckoned as valuable as gold.

From this new reformation made by Ezra in the Jewish church and commonwealth, the learned Prideaux begins the computation of Daniel's weeks; but as this is a subject quite out of our province, we refer those readers who are curious about it to consult the book itself (3).

self up wholly to the care of the Jewish affairs, and to reform some crying abuses, which had crept in among those who were returned from Babylon under Zerubbabel.

ONE of these was the intermarriages, which not only the common people, but even priests, levites, and heads of families, had made with some of their idolatrous neighbours <sup>p</sup>, by which they had introduced a mixed mongrel breed of Egyptians, Moabites, Ammonites, Samaritans, and other strange nations among the true Israelites; to rectify this, Ezra issued out a proclamation, and ordered all that were returned from the captivity, to appear before him at Jerusalem on a set day, under the penalty of being excommunicated and forfeiture of all they had. As soon as they were assembled, he upbraided them in the severest terms for their crimes, so strongly forbidden by the Mosaic law; after which he obliged them to take a solemn oath, that as many as had been guilty of it, should put away both their strange wives and the children they had by them. But as the thorough cognizance of them atter was like to take up some considerable time, and the court of the temple was still uncovered, and exposed to the rains that fell then abundantly, he appointed commissioners to make strict search into every family, and to oblige all delinquents to comply with the covenant which Ezra had exacted from them. This scrutiny was accordingly begun on the first day of the tenth month, and ended on the same day of the first month, when the number of delinquents was found to amount to a hundred and fourteen, some of whom had had children by those strange wives <sup>q</sup>.

HIS next great work in pursuance to his commission was, to reform the whole state of the Jewish church, by restoring its discipline and rites, according to its antient pattern under the former prophets. In order to which, his first care was to collect and set forth a correct edition of the sacred books, and then to reduce the observance of the Mosaic law to that standard. This circumstance we find neither expressly mentioned in the sacred historians, nor in Josephus; but we have it from the Talmudists and other antient Jews, who add a great many others, which, not carrying the same probability with this, we shall for that reason give an epitome of in the margin (X). But as for this of his collecting and revising the the sacred books, making some small additions to them, and fixing the canon of the Old Testament to twenty two books, as they are now received by the Jews and protestant christians; we have many reasons to confirm it. He was excellently well versed in them; his extensive authority enabled him to gather up all the best copies that could be met with, either at Jerusalem or among the dispersed Jews; he was himself instituted by Moses in the seventy elders, and to have been since increased to a hundred and twenty; we have already confuted the greatest part of this assertion in a former volume, to which we refer the reader †.

2dly, in this synagogue they place among the principals of them the prophet Daniel and his three friends, Shadrach, Mesbach, and Abednego, whom they pretend to have been still alive, and to have returned from the captivity, though neither he, Ezra, or Nehemiah, mention any thing about any of them.

Lastly, and to mention no more, they place at the tail of this synagogue Simon the just, between whom and the time in which we supposed Daniel to have died there elapsed near two hundred and fifty years. The method they take to skip over this difficulty is equally absurd, and only exposes their ignorance of chronology; and this makes the judicious dean above quoted rightly suppose, that this pretended assembly of a hundred and twenty was only a succession of men, who put every one a helping hand to complete what Ezra had set on foot; and that Simon the just, who is the last there named, and was really so in point of time, was the person who gave the finishing stroke to that great work (4); for that it was not so far compleated in Ezra's time, as to have had no addition or amendment made to it afterwards, is scarce credible.

1st, Because we find in Nehemiah * the genealogy of Jeshua the high-priest is carried down to Iadua, and mention made of Darius the Persian, or Codomannus, who were recenter by at least a hundred years; and in the third chapter of the first book of the Chronicles, Zerubbabel's genealogy is carried down so far as must necessarily reach to the time of Alexander the Great.

2dly, Among the various readings noted in the margin of the sacred books which are attributed to Ezra, and are known by the names of Keri and Ketib, we find some in those of Ezra and Nehemiah, which cannot be supposed to have been put in by them, but by some of their successors in the work.

3dly, We may add, that Nehemiah and the Chronicles fall very short of that correctness of style and method that we find in the other books of the Old Testament, and for the reasons above alledged, were hardly admitted into the canon, till about the time of Simon the Just abovementioned.

pired; and had the assistance of two or three prophets (Y) in the work. The then confused state of the Jews required such a collection and revival of the sacred writings, and some such thing we find done soon after Nehemiah's arrival in Judea, when Ezra brought forth the sacred volume, and read and expounded it to all the people from morning till noon, during the whole seven days of the feast of tabernacles<sup>r</sup>. Lastly, the whole current of Talmudist writers, and all the antient and modern Jews<sup>t</sup>, (except the Samaritans, who reject all but the pentateuch, as shall be seen in due time; and Josephus, who perhaps did not think proper to tell the world that the sacred writings stood in need of such a revival and amendment) ascribe this work to Ezra, as president of the sanhedrin, and chief director and overseer of the whole, in which they have been followed by no small number of antient fathers<sup>u</sup>, and by far the greatest part of modern writers. We may further add, that there is no other way of justifying that great and zealous man, for leaving the city and outworks of the temple in that desolate state in which Nehemiah found them at his coming<sup>v</sup>, considering, that he met with no other

(Y) These were Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi, to which the Jews add, as we hinted in the last note, Daniel and his three companions. As for Malachi, they pretend, that he was the same with Ezra; that this last was his proper name, and מלאכי Malachi, which signifies my angel, or messenger, to have been that of his office, as being the person or prophet sent by God to restore the Jewish church to its pristine splendor and standard.

St. Jerom and some other antient writers have maintained the same notion (5): sure it is, that Malachi is rather a common than a proper name, and that in Ezra's time, prophets were called by that name (6); and accordingly, several antient fathers quoted Malachi under the title of the angel or messenger of God (7).

What seems to confirm that he was an assistant to, if not the same with, Ezra, is his reproving the people for marrying strange wives, (8), for their oppression of their poor brethren (9), and several other abuses which were then rectified by Ezra and Nehemiah.

obstacles, that we read of, from the Samaritans, but all possible encouragement from the Persian court ; but the supposition, that he thought it of greater moment to bestow his time and care in this new and correct edition of the sacred code, than to busy himself in repairing the outworks of the city and temple. It is in the time of this revival that he is supposed to have exchanged the old Hebrew character, for the more beautiful and commodious Chaldee now in use, and to have invented the Massorah (Z) vowel, and other points, concerning

(Z) By the term Massorah or Massoreth, which signifies tradition, is meant the unwritten rule or canon by which the reading and writing of the sacred books was fixed. We have already seen elsewhere, that the Jews affirm it to have been given by God himself to Moses, who delivered it to Joshua, Aaron, &c. by whom it was transmitted by oral tradition, through a long succession of holy and inspired men, down quite to Rabbi Judah, surnamed Hakkadosh, or, the holy, who wrote it in the book which they call the Mishna ; all which we have formerly confuted †, as a series of Rabbinic fictions.

Others, with more probability attribute it to this Ezra, who in the comparing of the several copies, out of which he was to compile his new authentic one, found himself under a necessity of correcting several errors which had crept in, through the ignorance and carelessness of the transcribers, and observing likewise here and there a different reading, which might be well enough preserved, he put the one, perhaps that which he thought the best, in the text ; and this the Jews call Keri ; the other he put in the margin, to intimate that it was otherwise written in some copies ; and those marginals were called Cetib. It were, however, absurd to suppose, that they were all inserted by him, since, as we hinted in a former note, we find some of them, not only in the book that goes by his name, and is justly attributed to him, but in some of a later date ; besides, many of those marginals are really trifling, and some of them far beneath the dignity of such an author. Those who understand the Hebrew tongue may see an instance of this in the places quoted in the margin (11).

As for the vowel points, which are said to have been invented by him, in order to fix the true sense of words, we have heretofore shewn them to be of much more modern date ‡. But as to the grammatical ones, especially the athnach and silluc, or soph-passuk, so called, because this last concluded every period, called by the Jews passuk, it is most likely they were devised either by, or very soon after, him ; for the Hebrew being almost forgotten during their captivity, and the Chaldee being become the current tongue, there was a necessity that those parashas or portions of scripture that were read in the temple and other synagogues, should be expounded to them by proper interpreters ; and this the Talmudists (12) tell us was done verse by verse in the law, which gave occasion to the invention of those points, in order to direct the readers when to stop ; but when they were afterwards forbid by Antiochus Epiphanes to read the law (13), and had substituted the lecture of the prophets instead of it ; the sense in these generally running a greater length, they were obliged to read and expound three whole verses at a time.

However, when the Maccabees had by recovering their liberty restored the antient reading of the law, they continued still reading also the prophets, and expounded the former verse by verse, and the latter every third verse ; in process of time they added likewise the other books called by them כתובים Cetubim, or hagiographa ; and this probably gave rise to the distinction of legal, prophetical, and hagiographical books, often mentioned in the gospel (14), and by Josephus (15)

How these periods or verses were marked in their books, is not easy to guess. If the Jews were then as superstitious as they have proved since, it is certain they could never suffer them to be inserted in any shape into the text, which they look upon as polluted by every adventitious point or dot, though ever so accidental. It is indeed a question whether they were so scrupulous in antient times ; but then, if Ezra, or any of his successors, ever admitted those stops, lines, points, or in any other form, it will be a wonder how they came afterwards to be expunged ; for it is plain there are none such admitted in their synagogues.

But the difficulty may be easily removed, by supposing, that they only left a blank space between period and period ; or, as Maimon imagines (16), that they finished every verse or period with a break, and began the next line with a new verse. But as they found these breaks to run to too great a length in many places, and caused their books, those we mean which they had for their private use, to swell to too great a bulk, they invented the

ANOTHER, and very useful, improvement, which he and his inspired associates are generally, and with great probability, believed to have made to this new edition of the sacred books, is the interspersing here and there an explanatory clause by way of parenthesis, and making such other additions to the text, as were necessary to explain, illustrate, or confirm it. Of this nature some suppose the account of Moses's death, and the excellent character given to that great law-giver in the last chapter of Deuteronomy, to have been; but it seems to us more probable, that this was inserted much earlier, namely by Joshua, or some of his cotemporary writers, in order to inspire the people with a singular respect and credit both to him and his writings. However that be, we meet with a great number, that, being manifestly inserted long after the facts, cannot well be ascribed to any but Ezra, or some of those prophets that assisted him in the work; thus we find in several of the historical books concerning some antient monuments, such-like words as these, added by way of testimony, which remain unto this day<sup>w</sup>; nay, many others of the like nature the reader may see in the margin (A). To the same end he is supposed likewise to have two grammatical points, which are now in use, and which the reader may find in all their pointed books.

But this was not the sole use of these grammatical points. Those who are acquainted with that tongue need not be told how necessary they are in fixing the sense in many places, nor how it may be, and is often rendered obscure, unintelligible, or even contrary by the misplacing of them. We have formerly given a notable instance of it **, from which the reader may guess of the rest; and shall dwell no longer upon it.

(A) Thus it is said in Genesis (17), that the Canaanites did then dwell in the land; which words could not be inserted till they had actually been extirpated out of it; and in another place of the same book (18), it is said, these are the kings that reigned in the land of Edom, before there reigned any king in Israel, which last words must of necessity have been inserted long after Moses's time. The large iron bed of Og king of Basan, said in Deuteronomy to have been still to be seen in the metropolis of the Ammonites (19), plainly intimates, that that prince had been killed long before this last clause was added. Lastly, and to mention no more, the twenty fifth chapter of the Proverbs, which begins with these words, The pro-

have added some new names of places to the old ones, which were become obsolete. Thus Abraham is said to have pursued the confederate kings as far as Dan, the name which the Danites gave long afterwards to Laiſh*. The same was done to Bethel, antiently called Luz, to Hebron, whose original name was Kiriath-Arba, and to many more, by the help of whose new names we come to the knowledge of the places there mentioned, which we could never have known by their old ones.

THE last work of this great man was the restoring the worship of the temple, according to its antient form before the captivity; to revise and amend the Jewish Liturgy, and to add particular prayers and thanksgivings, proper for the festivals that were superadded after their return from the captivity; such as the dedication of the new temple†, of Purim‡, and the like; and as the psalms entered into almost every part of their worship, and were to be sung alternately (B), as we have seen in a former volume, it is not to be doubted, but he took the same pains in collecting the whole book, and giving it the same revision which he had to the rest. Whether he digested them in the same order we have them now in, as is generally believed by Jews and Christians, and verbs of Solomon, which the men of Hezekiah king of Judah copied out, plainly shews, the words were added some considerable time after this last named king, who was twelve generations off Solomon.

(B) That is, not by hemistichs, as Meibonius and some others seem to have imagined, but by whole verses, as they are now sung in our cathedrals; for, first, some of those verses there are, which, as a learned prelate has lately observed against him (20), manifestly consist of three members, and so are incompatible with the method of singing by hemistich.

But what seems to us more decisive is, that in some other acrostics (21), whose verses are consequently determined, the letter vau not being admitted to begin the sixth verse, but being thrust in the middle of the fifth, just after the athnach, they substituted a verse after the last alphabetical one, which begins in them with the letter h, which can hardly be supposed to have been done, but to make the number of verses even, that the same side of the choir might not begin and end the same psalm, which addition would have been needless, had they been sung by hemistichs.

whether he was the author of those which were manifestly composed during the captivity<sup>a</sup>, and after their return from it<sup>b</sup>, such as we take those which are styled gradual to have been (C); and lastly, whether he lived to finish all these things, or left them to be compleated by his successors, we will not pretend to determine. One thing the second book of Miccabees informs us, that Nehemiah founded a library at Jerusalem, in which he deposited the acts of the kings, of the prophets, and of David<sup>c</sup>, which seems to intimate, as if the revision of them had been compleated before that time.

It is no less uncertain, whether this revision of the sacred books reached so far as the restoring of the poetical parts to their antient metre, or whether they contented themselves

(C) Concerning the title of these, which are fifteen in number, beginning at the hundred and twentieth, various have been the conjectures of the learned; its original import is a song of degrees or steps, which some interpreters mistaking, have rendered a song of excellences, or a most excellent song (22). The Chaldee paraphrast turns it, a song of the steps of the abyss, alluding to an old Jewish tradition; that when they came to lay the foundations of the second temple, such a stream of water gushed out, as rose fifteen cubits, and would in all probability have overflowed the country, had it not been quashed by virtue of the ineffable name of God, written upon the fifteen steps of the temple.

Hence interpreters have imagined, that these psalms had their names from the fifteen steps on which they were sung; but in what part of the temple, whether within or without, they can by no means agree. Others took the hint from thence, that they were sung on some high desk, or raised place, to which the singers went by steps; but where is there any foundation for this?

But if we consider, that the whole tenor of those psalms consists chiefly either in fervent prayers for their return from their captivity, or thanksgiving for having obtained it; and that the terms, ascent, and to ascend, are frequently used to express their return into their own land (23); as it was indeed a high hilly ground, is it not more natural to suppose those psalms to have been composed some a little before, and some presently after, and all upon the subject of this happy נִעְלִית, ascent, or return from Babylon to Jerusalem (24)? So Shir Hammeuloth will properly signify the song of the return, or of those that returned.

with such a punctuation and division of verses as would best fit them for the service of the temple. The generality of writers is for the latter; but there is one reason which seems to us very strong for the former, namely, that those psalms, which were composed after the captivity, appear to us to run much in the same cadence with those which had been written before it, and many of them, whatever some difficult critics may fancy to the contrary, seem to be in no case inferior to them; which seems a plain intimation, either that the rules of Hebrew poetry were not lost at Babylon, or that they were recovered after their return, though they have been in vain sought for ever since the total dispersion of that nation, as we have fully shewn in the place last quoted out of the third volume of this history. However, since that time the reverend prelate above quoted has favoured the learned world with his metrical edition of the psalms, by which he has at least convinced us, that the Hebrew metre is not so irrecoverably lost as we then imagined. It is true, we are far from thinking that he has actually discovered it; we shall hereafter give our reasons for it in the margin; but this we are bound to say in justice to his extensive learning, the indefatigable pains he has taken in that work, and the irrefragable arguments with which he has exploded the greatest part of the Massoretic trash, which has been hitherto an insurmountable impediment to such a discovery, to say nothing of the many sagacious rules and judicious criticisms, which the reader will find in that edition; that if his lordship has not quite paved the way to it, he has at least blown up those discouraging obstacles that obstructed it; so that we may now hope, that, by the help of this elaborate piece, those who have both time and genius for such an enterprise, will be now encouraged to follow so noble an example, from the present prospect of success, which they must have despaired of without it. Having said thus much in justice to that excellent piece and its learned author, we shall now, with his lordship's good leave, and with that honest freedom which the dignity of the subject demands of us, offer our reasons, why we think that his new-found metre comes infinitely short of what it appears to us to have originally been, and consequently, that the greatest part of the alterations and corrections made for the sake of it, and which are to be found in every page, are so many deviations from the original. And since we find that many of our readers expect we should give our opinion of this learned performance, we doubt not, but if we clear the sacred text from the corruptions which our learned prelate thinks he had corrected in it; and the Hebrew poetry from being such a low, crawling, and imperfect thing, as this edition makes it, not only they, but much more his good lordship, will be pleased with it; and that the merit of the cause will plead for the length of the following note, into which we shall for order and brevity's sake insert all that we have to say upon that subject (D).

WE

(D) In speaking of the sacred Hebrew poetry in a former volume *, we ventured to affirm, that it was unreasonable to suppose that an art, which, with respect to its noblest part, the strength of expression, loftiness of thought, beauty of metaphors, and imagery, was almost at its height in Moses's time; and had been so excellently well cultivated during so many centuries after, should yet be so uncouth and imperfect with respect to the metre, as Le Clerc and some other critics have made it; the latter being but a mere jingle, and within the compass of a much more ordinary genius. And this argument, we think, will hold much stronger against that even heavy and inelegant bitony, which our learned prelate has given us for it; and especially,

2dly, If we take in another part of his lordship's affirmation; namely, that it admitted of no distinction of long and short syllables, but used them all indifferently, as the nature of the verse, which is there affirmed to consist of no other variety than trochaic and iambic, required. For this once allowed, we may safely say with the poet, that Nil non erit versus, and that there is no period in the Old Testament, from Genesis to Malachi, that may not be thus versified, not to say, any other book in any other language; for proof of which, if the reader will but be at the small pains we have been induced to take, he may with ease reduce the whole common prayer book, either English, Latin, or Greek, into the same kind of verse, and without those frequent alterations, which his lordship is forced to make in the Hebrew text.

We may add, that quantity is in many cases so necessary and obvious to fix the sense of what is said or sung, that it is absolutely impossible the sacred poets should have been thus totally negligent of it.

But, thirdly, That neither poets nor musicians, from Moses to David, should have stumbled upon a variety of metres, answerable to the variety of subjects treated of in the psalms; but that the penitential ones, than which nothing can be more grave or solemn, as to the expression, should run on in the same merry pace with the eucharistical, encœnical, epithalamical, and others of a more cheerful nature; or that David, bewailing and begging pardon for his secret sins; should express himself in the same leaping anacreontic strain; as when he speaks of the mountains skipping like rams, and the little hills like young sheep (25), credat quicunque vult.

* Vol. III. p. 385, & seq. (25) Compare in this new edition, Psalm xix. 14, with cxiv. 3, & seq.

Lastly

WE return to Ezra, who, having been succeeded by Nehemiah, after he had governed the Jewish church and nation thirteen

Lastly, if the book of psalms, a book so highly esteemed, and in such constant use among all the Jews, can be once supposed to have been so mutilated, as to stand in need, not only of all that vast quantity of corrections which are here introduced for the sake of that metre; but of a great many more, which that learned prelate owns he could not restore; it is to be feared, whatever his lordship may think to the contrary, its authority will soon dwindle into nothing, especially, if that be admitted, which his lordship affirms in several places of that work, that a great number of those corruptions have been introduced into the text, not by the inadvertency and ignorance of transcribers, but by the superstition, or even malicious intent of the Jews themselves. But such a severe charge against a people, who, for ought appears to the contrary, have rather ran into the other extreme, ought to have been backed by some stronger proofs, than the bare structure of this new-found metre, which is at best built upon a tottering foundation, and in many cases upon a wrong one, as will, we hope, appear by what follows.

These were some of the main reasons that induced us to inquire further into the grounds of this new metre; and here we own, that his lordship could not have fallen upon a better way to come at his intended discovery, than that of framing his rules from the acrostic psalms, whose verses, being confined within their alphabetical limits, take away at once all occasion of expatiating. But the misfortune was, that he made choice of so short a one for his ground and pattern, which consisting but of ten verses, and by its structure appearing to have been designed, like some others of the like nature, to be committed to memory for frequent use, could not afford that variety of measure, &c. which is to be found in acrostics of a greater length, such as the 25th, 34th, 37th, and especially the 119th,

This last, his lordship justly observes, comes indeed vastly short of the poetic elegancy of the rest, with respect to the diction; but as to the metre, it affords such a beautiful variety of it, that it seems to contain an epitome of the whole Hebrew metre; and we doubt not, but if his lordship had bestowed the same pains in framing his rules from it, he might not only have given us a more noble idea of the sacred poetry, but likewise saved himself the endless trouble of distorting the text, to make it square with his own. All which put together gave us just cause to think, that his fondness for this new discovery had made him overlook several great beauties and excellencies in the Hebrew metre, which a closer and less partial examination might easily bring to light.

We had not gone far in this enquiry, before some of his metrical emendations gave us a manifest proof of it, and set us upon a thirteen years, assisted him in some parts of his office some few years, after which we hear no more of him. Josephus tells

much better scent: We observed, that his lordship was often forced, for the sake of the verse, to curtail a trisyllable into a bisyllable, or to stretch the latter into the former; but more particularly the names of God, Jah, Jahvoh, and Elohim, by exchanging them ad libitum, and contrary to the text, according as the verse required one, two, or three syllables, even as far as eighteen times in one psalm (26).

This, we observed, was constantly done in verses whose hemistichs ran either in the same number of syllables, except only in these names of God, as in the following :

or in parallel verses of different psalms; in the one of which the word Jahvoh, and the other Elohim, and sometimes Adonai, did occur (28), cæteris paribus. This made us apprehend at first, that if there was really any such metre in the psalms, his lordship was mistaken in reading the word יהוה Jahvoh, which ought to have been a trisyllable, in order to answer to Elohim and Adonai.

But finding upon further examination, that Elohim was in several places set to answer to other words, which were certainly bisyllable, as in the following (29),

Joduca	hammim	Elohim
Joduca	hammim	Cullam

What could be a stronger proof than this, that Elohim, consisting of two shorts and a long, was equivalent to the two long ones in Cullam, and consequently that the Hebrew metre admitted not only of long and short syllables, two of the last of which were equal to one of the former; but also that it consisted of trisyllables, bisyllables, and monosyllables, or what the prosodists call cesures? Such as are in the Latin pentameters, and in the Hebrew iambics. We have not room in a note to multiply examples; the reader may, by comparing the following ones, which are exactly according to the text, with those of our learned author, as he has been forced to distort them from it to reduce them to his metre, easily guess, to what a vast number of needless emendations this one single error of the Hebrew poetry consisting only of bisyllables, without distinction of quantity (30), has given birth, which might otherwise have happily been avoided.

Those that are conversant with the Hebrew tongue and sacred poets, will easily feel the advantage of admitting this variety of feet, not only with regard to its superior elegance to a dull constant bitony, but also towards the further discovery of the Hebrew metre in verses of unequal hemistichs; some of which run to such lengths above others, even in those acrostics abovementioned, that they contain often double, and sometimes treble the number of syllables.

This indeed our author looks upon as such a disgrace to the Hebrew poetry, that, right or wrong, he endeavours to avoid it every-where as much as possible; sometimes by the addition of one or more words, at other times by striking them out (34), by elisions, paragogics, and sometimes by splitting a long word between two hemistichs, or sometimes by splitting an hemistich into two, contrary to the constant structure of the psalm (35); and yet if we were to frame a judgment from the three last quoted psalms, xxxvii. cxix. and cxxxvi. one would be apt to think, that the sacred poets thought these transitions, from a long to a very short hemistich, an ornament; and such it is thought by all, in odes, epitaphs, and such like, which seem therefore to us to come nearest to the Hebrew genius and metre, not only of the psalms, but of the other poetic pieces of the Old Testament *.

Now this kind being so opposite to the trochaic and iambic, which his lordship had pitched upon for his standard, we need not wonder, that he has succeeded no better in his endeavours to bring it to it, since that could not be done but by constant stretching, dislocating, amputation, and other such-like violent methods, which his lordship, among many other learned men, hath justly objected against Le Clerc and others, who have attempted this discovery.

there in the hundred and twentieth year of his age. They bear so great a veneration for him, that they look upon him as

It is not the design of this note, to recover the antient Hebrew poetry, a task for which we have neither time nor abilities ; but to rescue it from that contempt into which both it and the Hebrew text must unavoidably fall, if it should once be supposed, that the former consisted only in a dull, sleepy and uncertain bipedality, and that the latter has been so corrupted and mutilated, partly by Jew-ish superstition and malice, and partly by the ignorance and inadvertency of transcribers. And therefore, though what has been said seem to us sufficient to vindicate it in both cases, yet, as the fact is a matter of such great moment, we shall take the liberty to animadvert upon some few more of his lordship's metrical emendations; that the reader may see how little reason he had to say, Ex metro liquido apparet ; frustra ergo sunt omnes hic interpretes : 36). We shall begin with the fiftieth psalm, out of the first verse of which he has struck the two names of God, El and Elohim, into the title, upon no other authority than the last-mentioned. Could his lordship indeed have backed it with one single instance of a psalm, incited, Mizmor El Elohim, or shewn that there was any absurdity or inelegancy in the expression, El, Elohim, Jahvoh, or Jehovah, the God of gods, or the Migh'y God ; such a change might have past for an amendment ; but to reject so noble an expression for the sake of a metre, which is at best as yet but in embryo, is a criticism which few of his readers will digest.

But were it really for the sake of the metre, that his lordship rejects this triplicate name of God, how easily might it have been remedied by lengthening the verse without any violence to the text ! As,

Eretz mimisrah shemesh had meboo*

or by any other way, rather than stripping the original of so lofty an expression. But if his lordship, or the reader, is by this time reconciled to that variety of metre we have endeavoured to establish above, the whole verse may be still made to run more elegantly, and conformably to the rest of the psalms, thus :

*El elo-him Jàh-vòh dìb ber
Vàjera èretz mimmiz rah
Shèmèsh vè hàd meboo*

But his lordship seems to be fond of spying out difficulties in the original, that he may have an opportunity of exercising his critical as a second Moses, a restorer of the sacred books and Masse-rah, and, in a word, one every way worthy to have been their talent. We shall give three pregnant instances of it; the first is in the eighth and ninth verses of the fortieth psalm; this place, obscure and intricate as his lordship calls it, after some additional words and a new disposition of the original ones, he leaves much more dark and unintelligible, and less elegant and grammatical than he found it, as the reader may see by comparing it with the text

Now all this trouble might have been saved, and the text not only cleared, but exactly adjusted, to the place, where the epistle to the Hebrews quotes it * by the single addition of the letter gaph before the word בִּמְגִלָּתְךָ bimgillath, and which may easily be supposed to have been omitted by reason of its similitude to the בֵּת beth, or even by the bare changing the one for the other, and reducing cemgillath instead of bemgillath; and then the verses will run thus, and in the bishop's own metre;

As a marti hinneh bati
then said I lo I come (kebim-gillath Sepher Catub (as in the volume of the book it is written halai) labioth rezo neka of me) to do thy will Elo-haikha-phasti
O my God, I am well pleased with it
Vetho-rathea betoc-Mehai
And thy law is within my heart.

The altering the points in the verb kbaphazti, and making it the substantive kbephzati, will render it still more elegant; and the sense will be, O my God, and my delight; or, O God, thou art my delight, and thy law is within my heart.

The next is in the sixty-eighth psalm, verse 14; where the author not being able to light upon a better sense than that which the vulgate and our version gives it, Though ye have lain among the pots, yet shall ye be as the wings of a dove, &c. has been forced to insert the words tehiu and ce, and to double that of Jonah with the addition of the ב in the first. Now all this might have been saved, and the sense made not only much plainer, but more elegant, by reading תִּהְיֶינָה instead of יִהְיֶינָה, which is but a small alteration in comparison of his; and then the sense will be plainly this; Though ye have lain among the pots or rather, according to the parallel in Genesis xlix. 15. Though ye sink between two burthens, yet shall the dove (emblem of innocence) escape with her wings covered with silver, and her feathers with the purest gold.

Ki higdalta hal col Shemca imratheca ;

which not being altogether so intelligible, his lordship rectifies by adding the word Shem before Shemka, and casting out the last word, as absurdly added and without sense, and for a proof of it sends us to the parallel of St. Paul (37).

I hope his lordship will not think imratheca, thy word, to have been here maliciously added by the Jews, since, if we understand the apostle right, he speaks there of Christ the word, the logos made flesh, and crucified, and for which God has given him a name above every name. If therefore instead of striking it out, his lordship had only expunged the pronoun ׀ after Shem, without any farther alteration, the sense would have much better tallied with St. Paul's quotation thus : For thou hast magnified thy word above every name. His lordship could not be ignorant, what is universally understood by the Hebrew Imrah, the Chaldee Mamre, the Greek Logos, and the Latin Verbum, when applied to that divine Person.

It is true, if we admit the original word imratheca, the verse will be one syllable too long for the foregoing ; a misfortune which often happens in the text, but which his lordship is never at a loss to obviate, either by an elision or a paragogic, though, for our part, we should rather chuse to remedy it by the rule heretofore given of making two short syllables equal to a long one.

Much of the same nature is the correction of Psalms lxxiv. v. 3. where his lordship strikes out of the verse the words lemasbuoth netzakh, perpetual desolations, as absurd and contrary to the context, (in which the psalmist begs of God to put an end to them) and fills up the chasm with the word Calleb, which he fetches out of the eleventh verse, where he pretends it to be redundant.

His lordship, we believe, is the first that thinks it nonsense for a man to pray to God to put an end to his perpetual, that is, constant, and hitherto uninterrupted, misfortunes ; besides, the word נֶצַח netzach, it is well known, doth not always imply the duration, but often strength, greatness, violence, and insurmountableness of a thing ; and therefore not only very applicable to the then dreadful desolations of the sanctuary, but also very fit to be humbly presented to that God whose hand alone could remedy them.

But there is still another and much more natural way of clearing the original, than that of his lordship's, by supposing the verb to have been originally נֶצַח netzach, fly, which the transcribers, not understanding, changed it for the other, which was more known to

and make him the author of it : and he was certainly so of the first, since he speaks of nothing in it, but what was done in his

them. The expression of lift up thy feet, which alludes to a bird just going to take flight, confirms this sense, which will run thus, lift up thy feet, and fly to those dreadful devastations which thy enemies perpetually commit in thy holy place.

But this not being perceived by the transcribers, in order to make their netzakh run smooth with the rest, they changed the order of the words, which probably ran thus :

Harimah pahameka
Netzah lecol Malshuoth
Herah ojob bakkodesh.

As for the word חָלַל, which his lordship fetches from the eleventh verse, we think it fully as well where it is, and where it is properly the participle pabul of the verb חָלַל, to shut, or inclose, the ח elided by reason of the feminine, she band, there said to be shut up in the bosom. See a parallel in Psalms lxxxvii. v. 9.

From these few examples the reader may see the ill consequence of too great an attachment to a favourite system : but the mischief has not stopt here ; and the notion, that the text was so corrupt, that nothing but these violent means could possibly recover it, has spread itself to other places, where the metre did not want those emendations. Thus his lordship tells us, in his notes on Psalms cvii. v. 25 and 29, that the words jahmed and jakem had manifestly changed places. We had indeed long before suspected some error in the last verb, but never dreamt of this way of rectifying it. However, it appeared so plausible to us at the first reading, that we readily jumped over the difficulty of accounting how two such words, that stood at the distance of four verses, or eight hemisties, asunder, should, contrary to the plain sense of the text, be jumbled into each other's place ; and we transposed them according to his correction in our manuscript psalter.

But we had not often read over the expression jahmed ruakh sebarab lidmamah, before we observed a manifest absurdity in it, since that verb in this conjugation doth not signify to make to stand still, but to cause to stand, to act ; and could not consequently belong to the latter, but to the former of the verses, where it was raised to cause the storm there spoken of ; and we accordingly replaced it where it ought to be.

The difficulty then was how to rectify the word jakem, which, as it is there written, must be owned to be nonsense, unless we take it in the same figurative meaning, which it is known to have in 1 Sam. iv. 15. and 1 Kings xiv. 4. and elsewhere. But here the thirty-third and thirty fifth verses of the same psalm furnished us with a much more plausible salvo than his lordship's improbable transposition, it being much more likely that a transcriber should his time and under his eye, and almost every-where speaks of himself in the first person ; but if he wrote the second, some additions mistake or overlook one letter for another, than that he should thus transpose two distant words against all sense ; and thus we write יָשֵׁם jashem, to turn, instead of יָקֵם jakem, to raise, Jashem Seharah Lidmamah turneth the tempest into a calm, will then answer to Jashem Nebaroth l' Midbar, verse 33. he turneth the rivers into a dry wilderness, and Jashem Midbar l' agam Majim, verse 33, a dry wilderness into a standing water.

If our readers, however, should dislike this verb, either on account of its occurring three times within so small a distance from each other, or because it is not elegant enough to answer the context, he may find some more noble ones in the verbs יָקַע, to break, יָקַע, to blunt, יָקַע, to tire, whose last letters being so near like the ם, might easily be mistaken for it, the verb, קָם being more familiar to them, than the others, which occur but seldom.

But after all, we very much question, whether any other change need to be made than the bare transposition of the particle ל from demamah to seharah, and so יָקֵם קָסֶעֶרָה דִּמְמָה will properly signify, He makes the calm to succeed the storm, an expression no ways irregular or inelegant. The reader, however, may see by this one instance, how many easier ways that text might be rectified, than that which the learned author has pitched upon.

We shall end this note with one animadversion more on that learned prelate's edition, by which the reader will plainly see, that his lordship is not always so happy as to take the best sense of the psalmist. We observed in a former volume *, that some of the figures in that sacred book are so high and compound, that they were not easily perceived by every reader.

Our learned bishop's singular opinion of the rudeness of the Hebrew poetry, hath made him not only overlook many of them, but even quarrel with some, which had he been otherwise prejudiced, might have challenged his admiration. One of them, for instance, is in Psalms lxxii. v. 16. This noble psalm is intitled to Solomon ; but what is contained in it is generally understood to regard the reign of the Messiah : but be that reign whose it will, here is foretold, among other great blessings, such an uncommon plenty, that Pissath bar, a little handful of corn, sown on the tops of the mountains, naturally the most barren, should outvie the fertile Libanus for increase. One would wonder how a person of his profound judgment could be dissatisfied with so elegant a phrase ; and yet he tells us in his note, that unless the word pissath be allowed here to have a contrary sense, that is, to signify a great abundance, he shall suspect it to have crept in instead of some word of the like import ; which would be in fact losing all the beauty of the expression, as much as if his lordship had said, that the fer-additions must have been made to it since his death ; but the difference of style seems to prove it of another hand, as well as that of the two books of Chronicles, which it is not, however, improbable, he might have had the revisal of ; as for the other two books falsely attributed to him, and known by the names of the first and second books of *Esdra*s, they are justly rejected ; however, we shall subjoin a short account of each in the margin (E).

tile vallies ought to be inserted instead of the barren mountain tops ; for where would be the wonder, that a great heap of corn, or a fertile ground, should bring forth a plentiful crop ?

Of the same nature is that noble expression of the psalmist †, where he compares himself to bammetim khopsbi, to a corpse secluded even from among the dead, alluding to the Jewish way of burying ; for as the graves of the dead polluted the living, who came near them, so those who died a violent death, or under the anathema, were to have a grave separate from the rest, lest they should pollute even their fellow dead ; and that this is the allusion here intended, is plain by the verses immediately following, and implied in the word khalalim, which should properly be rendered, not wounded, but profane, abominable, and which, mijadeca nigzaru, are cut off from thy hand, plainly shews ‡ ; but his lordship, having overlooked this beautiful figure, has struck off the word bammetim, as spoiling the sense as well as the verse ; how rightly, let the reader judge.

Thus much we thought incumbent upon us to say of that learned and elaborate work, which, if it has not answered the end which its noble author proposed, may yet be read, as it was by us, with great pleasure and profit, not only on account of numberless judicious criticisms and observations which the reader will find in it, but as it will administer the greatest helps that ever were, as yet, thought on, by any of the learned, towards the recovering of the antient Hebrew poetry. As to the rest, we dare believe, it will be no small pleasure to that learned and pious prelate, to find the discovery of his mistakes turn so much to the credit and vindication of the sacred text and of its inspired penmen.

(E) The first book of *Esdra*s is no other than the first book of Ezra, with a variety of fabulous circumstances, particularly that of the three young men of Darius's guard, who for their exquisite wisdom in answering his questions, are there pretended to have obtained, among other marks of his favour, the liberty of returning to Jerusalem and of rebuilding the temple (29). The Greek church is the only one that holds it among the canonical books.

The second book is acknowledged by neither Jews nor Christians, being a work which carries the manifest marks of imposture. It is falsely pretended to have been written by Ezra himself, tho' filled partly with rabbinic fables, such as the account of the six days creation, particularly of Behemoth and Leviathan, two monstrous creatures, designed for a feast to the elect after the resurrection (30), and partly with some gospel notions, corrupted and fitted to the author's taste. Of this nature are the nearness of the day of judgment, the appearance of the son of God to him, and many more not worth repeating.

Mohammed has also stuffed his Koran with some monstrous fables; he not only owns him to have recovered the sacred books, which had been in a great measure lost, but affirms that he wrote them with five pens at once. He adds, that this miracle not convincing the incredulous Jews that he had rightly performed the task, one of the company told the rest, that one of his ancestors had formerly hid a fair copy of them in the cleft of a rock; which being fetched and compared with this new one of Ezra, they found such an exact agreement between them, as convinced them that he had been supernaturally assisted in it; some other fables he adds, which the reader may find in D'Herbelot (31).

The eastern christians believe, that Ezra, having swallowed down some of the mud of the well, wherein the sacred fire had been hid before the captivity, was immediately inspired, and enabled to write all the sacred books afresh (32). This seems to be partly taken out of the second book of *Esdra*s, where that fabulous author tells us, that having begged of God to direct him how to recover those lost volumes, God gave him to drink of a liquor of a fiery colour; by the help of which he was enabled to dictate them to five scribes at the same time, who were forty days in writing two hundred and four volumes (33).

(F) The text calls him barely the son of Hachaliah (34), without informing us of what tribe he was. Some therefore from a passage in the Maccabees (35), where he is said to have offered sa-mission from him to succeed Ezra in the government of Judæa, with full power to rebuild and adorn both city and temple, and with fresh orders to Sanballat and others of his officers on this side Euphrates, to furnish him with all necessary materials out of the king's treasury. Nehemiah, having gathered a fresh supply of men and women to return with him into Judæa, departed under an escort which the king had granted, and arrived at Jerusalem, where he kept himself in private three days, at the end of which he went in the night, accompanied with a few of his men, to take a full view of the city and walls, which he found to answer exactly the report that had been made to him of it at Shushan. On the The wall morrow he sent for the heads of the people, and in the great finished assembly opened his commission, which he told them he would immediately put in force, and set about the finishing of the wall; he divided the work between a number of great families, each of which undertook a part of a stated extent, and was to build it at their own charges; and the new governor plied them so close, that in fifty two days they had all compleated their task, notwithstanding the many discouragements which he met with, both from within and from without <sup>g</sup>.

FOR while the work was going on, they were forced to bear with many a bitter sarcasm from Sanballa, a Horonite (G), governor of Samariat, and some others of his officers; but this was nothing to some of their underhand plots to obstruct crifices, and from his being reckoned at the head of the priests that signed the new covenant with God (36), have affirmed him to have been of the family of Aaron.

But as there is nothing conclusive in all this, and seems expressly contradicted by his saying in another place, that he was not a fit person to shelter himself in the temple (37; the far greater part suppose him to have been of the royal family of Judah 38); and this is so much the more probable, because we find none but such promoted to those high stations about the king's person; but never read of a priest that was so, till a long time after, and upon a quite different account, as the sequel will shew.

(G) Probably so called, because he was a native of Horonaim, a city of Moab; their other two principal enemies were Tobias the Ammonite, and Geshem the Arabian; all consequently ill-affected to struct it; for they went so far as to hire some treacherous Jews to dishearten both the governor and people, with the specious pretence that they were sent from God to put a stop to the enterprize. Nehemiah soon found out the cheat, but foreseeing that his enemies would not fail to use force, if their subdolous practices failed, ordered the people to arm themselves even while they were at work, placed strong guards to defend them, and trumpeters at convenient distances from each other, that at what quarter soever they should chance to be attacked, the rest, upon hearing the alarm, might come immediately to their assistance. But the greatest obstacle of all was, that the poorer sort, who were to bear the greater share of the labour, had been so impoverished by continual extortions from the rich, even long before his arrival, that they had already been forced to mortgage their lands, sell their sons and daughters, and submit to so many other hardships, that they were quite disabled from pursuing it. Nehemiah, who expected nothing less than to hear of such horrid cruelties being committed by the Jewish rulers, upbraided them in the severest terms; and partly by persuasions, and partly by his own authority, obliged them to restore all their ill-gotten wealth to the poor owners, and at the same time took care, that they should be supplied with all necessary sustenance while they continued in the work <sup>b</sup>; by these means he defeated the measures of the Samaritans. As soon as the wall was finished, he caused the dedication of it to be celebrated with the usual solemnities by the priests and levites <sup>c</sup> (H), and the Jews, but now doubly so, since they were likely to be dispossessed by them of many a good estate, which they had seized on during their captivity.

(H) This noble ceremony, which is described in the chapter above quoted, consisted in the purification of the priests and people, that they might partake of the sacrifices that were to be offered on that solemnity. After this they assembled themselves at one of the gates, whence dividing themselves into two bands, the one of them took to the right, and the other to the left, and marched in a solemn procession round the wall, till they met each other at the temple; they were followed by the priests blowing their trumpet, and with other singers and musicians.

As soon as they were come to the temple, the two choirs placed themselves opposite to each other; and while they were singing some psalms proper to the occasion, the priests offered a great number of sacrifices, especially of oxen, after which they spent the remainder of the day in feasting and mirth.

and left the government of the city to his two brothers, Hanani and Hananiah <sup>k</sup>, whilst himself returned, as is reasonably supposed, into Persia (I), to obtain a new commission, the old one extending no farther than the rebuilding the city wall, which was now actually done.

HITHERTO Jerusalem, large and spacious as it was, remained still but thinly peopled, the far greater part having settled themselves in the country round about; and whenever any business called them into the city, they seldom failed returning at night to their habitations. This Nehemiah had indeed forbidden while the wall was building; but after it was finished, they returned to their usual course. This therefore obliged him to provide for its safety, by causing a greater number of people to come and settle in it. He persuaded at first the nobler and richer to build them houses there, which they the more gladly complied with, because their country-seats were very much infested with thieves and banditti, who made frequent excursions against them. After this they took in all that willingly offered themselves to come and settle there; but these not proving sufficient, he was obliged to take every tenth family by lot; so that by this time the city being well built, peopled, guarded, and fortified, it began to resume something of its former lustre <sup>l</sup>; and Herodotus, who saw it soon after this time, compares it to Sardis, the metropolis of Asia Minor <sup>m</sup> (K).

(I) This is indeed the most probable of the two, as the learned Prideaux observes (39; for as his commission was only to repair the wall of the city, the only thing he had begged of the king, it is likely he went to have it enlarged, before he undertook any thing new; besides, it is not very likely, that he would have committed the government of the city to any one, whilst himself was there present.

His great interest at the Persian court might then give such a dispatch to his business, and his return to Jerusalem might be so sudden, that he did not think it material to mention it in history.

(K) Herodotus calls it Cadytis; but whoever reads what the learned Prideaux has said on that subject (40), will easily think with him, that it could be no other than Jerusalem.

tabernacles*

WHILE Nehemiah was thus employed in peopling and fortifying the city, adorning the temple, and rectifying the genealogies both of priests and people (L), Ezra, who had by that time finished his collection of the sacred books, was preparing himself and some other learned priests to make a solemn lecture of them to the whole nation, on the next approaching festival, which was that of the trumpets ushering in the new year. To this end a capacious scaffold or desk was raised in one of the largest streets of the city, that the people, who came from all parts of the land to the feast, might conveniently hear it. Ezra was seated in the midst with the sacred volume before him, and on each side stood six priests, well versed in the Hebrew and Chaldee, who did interpret in the latter what he read in the former; and this was done, as we observed before, verse by verse, and was continued from morning till mid-day. Nehemiah then, reminding them of the joyful festival they were then celebrating, dismissed them for that day, charging them to spend the remainder of it in feasting and mirth, and to make their poor brethren partake of their joy. This caution was so much the more necessary, because he observed, that the people shed abundance of tears at the hearing of the law, which he interpreted to proceed from such a remorse of their past deviations from it, as was likely to damp the mirth of that solemnity<sup>n</sup>. As the people shewed a more than common desire to have this lecture and exposition continued to them, Ezra complied with their request, until he and his assistants had gone through the whole pentateuch. The grand festival of tabernacles being likewise near at hand, it opportunely happened, that that part of Leviticus, in which

(L.) This had been done once before soon after the return, as we have heretofore hinted; but not so clearly, but that there were still many families of priests, levites, and of the people, who could not make out their claim to their tribe, and were then suspended. It is therefore likely, that some of them were since enabled to make out their title, and were then inserted in this new register, together with those who came up with Nehemiah. Several of the old families, that came up upon the first edict, might be by this time extinct; all which is probably the cause of the difference we find in the genealogies of the books of Ezra and Nehemiah.

(M) It

which it is enjoined, was read some days before; by which they were made sensible, how short they had been till then of its due observation; so that the next they kept was observed with greater strictness and solemnity, than it had been since the time of Joshua ° (M).

BUT this was not all the advantage which Nehemiah reaped from this lecture of the law to such a great concourse of people; there appeared such a lively concern in them whenever any point of the law was read, of which they knew themselves transgressors, that he made use of that happy disposition to extort from them a general confession of all their sins, and a solemn promise and vow to rectify all that was amiss for the future; and this was accordingly complied with by all the people, especially with respect to the four following heads; namely, 1. Not to make any intermarriages with the Gentiles, and to disannul the old ones (N): 2. The observation

° Ibid. vers. 12. & seq.

(M) It is supposed to have been at this solemnity, that the notable discovery happened of the sacred fire related in the book of Maccabees (41), and which we have hinted in a former volume. The Jews affirm, that Jeremiah, or some other prophet, had caused it to be hid in a dry well a little before the taking of Jerusalem (42); the memory of it having been still preserved to that time, Nehemiah caused it to be fetched out for the divine service.

But when they came to uncover the well, they found no fire there, but only a thick mud, which being brought, however, and poured upon the wood of the altar, and victims that were laid on it, all on the sudden the sun, which had hitherto been overcast, began to shine upon it, set the wood on fire, and consumed the burnt-offerings. Nehemiah caused the rest of the mud to be fetched, and poured upon some large stones, which were immediately covered with flames, but these were presently absorbed by those that flew from the altar thither.

This wonderful accident being afterwards related to the king of Persia, he ordered the place where the fire had been kept to be surrounded, and to be looked upon as sacred and inviolable. It raised still more his esteem of the Jewish nation and religion, and his respect shewed itself in the considerable presents which he made to the priests and temple. In memory of this wonderful discovery, the Jews instituted a feast, which they called the feast of the new fire.

(N) Either those which they had contracted since the general of sabbaths, sabbatic years, and those divine commands which related to them, such as letting their land rest, release of servants, and the like : 3. The punctual payment of their yearly tribute to the temple, both for the repairs and the maintenance of the divine services in it ; and 4. The exact payment of their tythes, first-fruits, vows, &c. to the priests and levites <sup>p</sup>. The solemnity concluded with a generous collection, which he caused to be made among them for the service of the temple ; in which, to shew a noble example to the rest, he gave himself a thousand drachms of gold, fifty dishes, and five hundred and thirty-two priestly vestments. Josephus adds, that he built several houses for the priests, in order to oblige them to reside at Jerusalem <sup>q</sup>. Sure it is, that, whether his place of cupbearer had raised his fortune to such a height, which is not improbable, or whether he had a considerable patrimony, to enable him, he did many generous and public-spirited things in Judæa ; among which that of maintaining a noble table and splendid equipage at his own cost, without exacting the tribute assigned for the maintenance of a governor, was none of the least. Having thus with great credit and honour compleated the tenor of his commission, he returned into Persia, according to his promise to the king <sup>r</sup>, after having enjoyed the government of Judæa twelve years.

DURING his absence, which lasted but five years, it is almost incredible, what abuses were crept into the Jewish church and common wealth ; so soon were that perverse nation liable to forget their most solemn vows, and the miseries which their breach of them constantly brought upon them. Eliashib, whether the then high priest, or some other of the same name, who was overseer of the temple chambers <sup>s</sup>, had married his grandson to the daughter of Sanballat the professed enemy of the Jews (O), and had had so much base complaisance repudiation, which had been made under Ezra, or perhaps had been contracted before it, but the offenders had refused or neglected to perform that covenant ; for sure it is, that, as soon as this feast was over, they set about this work afresh, and obliged as many of those offenders, as were found to have strange wives (43), to repudiate them,

complaisance for him, as to allow his friend Tobias the Ammonite, another sworn enemy, a large apartment in that sacred place from which even the Israelites, who were not of the tribe of Levi, were excluded. To this end, he caused those chambers, wherein the tithes of corn, wine, and oyl, meat-offerings, &c. used to be repositied, to be emptied for his accommodation. This mischief was followed by another: The priests, seeing the temple profaned by that stranger, their apartments given to his retinue, and gutted of that which was laid up for their maintenance, forsook the place, and went to live elsewhere, where they could; and this caused an intermission of the divine worship. It is not improbable, that Nehemiah, who, even at that distance he was then from Jerusalem, kept still a watchful eye over it, was soon informed of these abuses; so that having procured a fresh commission from Artaxerxes, he returned to Jerusalem at the end of five years from his departure. A less authority than his, or a man of less zeal, could hardly have ventured to reform an abuse, in which some of the greatest persons were concerned; but the base cowardice of the priest and the impudence of the Ammonite were too flagrant and impious to be suffered by a man of his character. As soon therefore as he was come to Jerusalem, and had been a witness of the fact, he expelled the gentile stranger out of his apartment, caused all his furniture to be thrown out, the place to be purified, and the priests and holy things to be reimplaced as formerly.

*The temple

ANOTHER shameful abuse, which had crept in during his absence, was an almost total disregard of the sabbath; they threshed their corn, pressed their wine and oyl, bought and sold from the Tyrians and other strangers, who affected to the Jews and this Ammonite, besides that mentioned above; for Tobias had married the daughter of Shecaniah the son of Arach, one of the chiefs of the Jews, and his son had married the daughter of Mesbullam the son of Berachiah (44), one of the chief overseers in the rebuilding of the temple (45). All which, being expressly forbid by the Mosaic law, and contrary to the solemn covenant they had so lately taken against such unlawful marriages, plainly shews their insincerity, and that it was not the fear of God, but of their governors, whether judges, kings, or deputies, that kept them within bounds; no wonder then, if God did so often suffer them to fall under the heavy hand of those very enemies, and to be so severely punished by means of those very alliances which they contracted, contrary to his express commands, as the sequel will shortly shew.

bring their mercantile wares into that city on that day, rather than on any other of the week ; and were basely suffered to do so by those magistrates, whose business it was to have hindered it. To prevent this practice for the future, Nehemiah, having reprov'd those magistrates in the severest terms, ordered the gates of the city to be shut every Friday night about sun-set, and not to be opened again till the sabbath was quite over ; by which means those strangers, having been disappointed twice or thrice, and been threatened from the walls with some further punishment, desisted from coming any more on that day. What aggravated the folly and baseness of the Jews is, that they had among them three considerable prophets, who rebuked them severely for their crimes, and warned them of the dreadful punishments which their shameful neglect of God's laws would bring upon them.

THESE were Zechariah, Haggai, and Malachi, of whose remarkable prophecies the reader will find a short summary in the margin (P) ; but what the authority of the prophet could

The wor-

(P. Zechariah, for the number, excellency, and preciseness of his prophecies, is emphatically termed Sol inter prophetas minores ; he was cotemporary with Ezra, Nehemiah, Haggai, and Malachi, if this last be not the same with Ezra. He began to prophesy about two months after Haggai, and with him to encourage the rebuilding of the temple, by assuring them of the divine protection and blessing on the work.

But these prophecies are inconsiderable, in comparison of those which foretel the coming of the Messiah in the plainest terms ; the cruel war which Antiochus Epiphanes waged against the Jews, and God's severe judgments against that tyrant ; the Jewish war with the Romans, and the death of the Messiah ; the annulling of the old Mosaic covenant, and the new one substituted by and under Christ ; the thirty pieces of silver ; the siege of Babylon by Darius, as Jeremy and Isaiab had done long before him ; from which it is supposed the Jews took timely warning, and retired out of it. Lastly, he speaks gloriously of the state of the christian church ; of the conversion of the gentiles to it ; of the persecutions which the christians should endure ; and the severe punishment of their persecutors, and other such-like events contained in the ninth and following chapters of his prophecies.

Some learned critics of our church (46) have indeed suspected the ninth, tenth, and eleventh chapters, which are a continued discourse or prophecy of the same events, to have been of Jeremy, because a formal passage out of it is quoted by St. Matthew under could not do, that of the governor's presence soon brought about; so that besides those abuses we have already observed he rectified a number of others, which were no less enormous; one of which was the ceasing of the divine worship through the avarice of the people, who refusing to pay the priests and levites their tithes and other dues, had forced them to seek their living out of the temple and city. All these Nehemiah restored to their former regularity, and reformed every thing that was amiss, not probably all at once, as one might be apt to think from their being mentioned together in one chapter<sup>c</sup>, but at several times, and as opportunity served:

ALL these enormities, introduced within the short interval of his absence, being manifestly owing to their ignorance or forgetfulness of the Mosaic law, did soon point out to him, that the only way to remedy them, was to enforce the frequent lecture and exposition of it, not only in Jerusalem, but also in all other cities and places of Judæa, as it had been formerly done with good success by some of the pious kings of Judah. These lectures were probably read at first in some great street or market-place, since we read of no buildings erected for that purpose before this time (Q); but as they

his name (47). Some other reasons they give for this their conjecture, which the curious may read in those authors.

But the general opinion is, that the name of Jeremy has crept into that place of the evangelist, instead of that of Zechariah. How long he prophesied, and what death he died, is no where said, the Mohammedans confound him with Zecharias the father of John the Baptist.

As for Malachi, of whom we have had occasion to speak before, the current of his prophecies runs intirely against the vile abuses that were crept into the Jewish church and state, such as mixed marriages, breach of the sabbaths and sabbatic years, oppressing the poor, defrauding the priests and levites of their tithes, and such other enormities, which were afterwards reformed by Nehemiah.

(Q) We have formerly shewn †, that before the captivity, they used to assemble themselves at the schools of the prophets on the sabbaths, new moons, and other festivals, to have the scriptures explained to them; but as to synagogues, we read nothing precise concerning them.

Those that think they had them before the captivity, do indeed object a passage out of the psalms (48), in which it is said, that the heathen had destroyed col mohadde el, or, as our version renders it, all the synagogues of God; but the word mohed signifies properly a congregation so that the place here mentioned, might signify no more than oratories, or what the Greeks called proseuchia (49), or any of those places where the prophets read or made lectures to them. However that be, it doth not appear, that if they had any such places for the reading and expounding of the scriptures, they were under such strict regulations, and in such numbers, as we find them after Nehemiah's time.

As to the regulations of these new synagogues, they may be reduced to the three following heads; 1. They were to be under the inspection of certain rulers, called from thence rulers of the synagogue, and by the Greek Jews archisynagogoi. 2. They had their stated times for coming to them, viz. on the sabbaths, and other feast and fast-days, and on Mondays and Thursdays; they had also their stated hours for each day. 3. They had proper ministers appointed, some to read and expound the current section out of the sacred books, others to read the liturgy, others to sing, &c. and these, provided they were in every respect else qualified for those offices, might be chosen out of any tribe; only they took care to have always one or more of the priestly order to preside and take care, that the service was performed with due order and decency.

The person who was appointed to read the liturgy, was called sheliach zibbor, that is, the angel, or messenger of the congregation, because he offered up the prayers of the people to God, or was the mouth or representative of the congregation to Godward; and as a messenger from God to men was called an angel of God, so one from men to God was styled an angel of the people; in this sense the christian bishops were called the angels of the churches; this person was always one of the rulers of the synagogue; he was also called khakam, or wise-learned, as were also the other rulers, and presided in their assemblies, and some in their courts of judicature.

Next to him was the khazan, who either read or looked over those who offered themselves to read the sections of the day, and corrected them when they read wrong; this officer had the sacred books, and other utensils, under his care, and had a scizmas or servant under him, who had the keys and overseeing of the synagogue, them to build some convenient places to assemble in, which have been since known by the name of synagogues and schools. For the same purpose the Chaldee paraphrases, known by the name of targums, were also introduced much about the same time, to facilitate the knowledge of the Mosaic law and of the other sacred volumes, among those who were unacquainted with the original; but as these were not finished till a considerable time after Nehemiah's death, but the khazan's chief business was to expound the portions of scripture that were read on that day, or to appoint or permit any other to do it for him, or to preach a sermon on some proper subject.

Thus, when Christ was entered into the synagogue, we read that the book of Isaiab was presented to him, which he read and expounded to the congregation (50); the like was also done by the apostles (1). This khazan was likewise the person who gave out and began those psalms and hymns that used to be sung by the whole congregation.

2. As to the number of these synagogues, they must have far exceeded those before the captivity, if any such then were; since Maimon tells us, the rule was, that where ever there were ten Batelmim, or Israelites of full age, there was to be a synagogue (2); and these were so multiplied in our Saviour's time, that the city of Tiberias had no less than twelve, and in Jerusalem the Jews affirm them to have amounted to four hundred and eighty (3); if these last are not somewhat enlarged, as Lightfoot suspects, who thinks that these ten Batelmim were the elders and ministers of that synagogue (4). 'Tis plain, however, that they were in great number, not only in Jerusalem and Palestine, but also in all other places of their dispersion. And even in that metropolis, we find the Alexandrians, Cilicians, Cyrenæans, Asiatics, Libertines, who had their own separate synagogues (5); from which we may infer; that there were many others which belonged to Jews of other nations; and the Jews tell us, that every handicraft had also their separate ones (6); but this we will not vouch for.

We should stretch this note too far, were we to give an account of the liturgy, ceremonies, and other particulars relating to those synagogues; the reader may see them in the authors quoted in this note; and especially in dean Prideaux, who has collected all that is worth knowing concerning them, and to whom we refer those who want a fuller account of them (7).

we shall take a more proper time to speak of them. Thus far had this great man carried on the reformation of the Jewish church and state. As for the unworthy son of Joiada, whom Josephus calls Manasseh, instead of complying with the governor's orders of parting with his strange wife, he retired with her to Samaría to his father-in-law, and drew a great many other rebellious Jews after him, who had been guilty either of the same, or any of those enormous crimes which were then reforming at Jerusalem, and went and settled themselves under the protection of Sanballat the Samaritan governor (R).

(R) The long interval between the Sanballat, who obstructed Ezra in the rebuilding of the temple, and this, whose daughter was married to Manasses, has made some writers split him into two; the one called by Ezra the Horonite, and not mentioned by Josephus; and this, whom the latter calleth a Cuthean, who went over to Alexander, especially because he is there affirmed to have come over to his father-in-law in the reign of Darius Codomannus (8).

This is indeed too glaring an anachronism to be admitted; for whoever compares the time in which Nehemiah returned from Jerusalem into Persia, viz. in the thirty second year of Artaxerxes, or before Christ four hundred and forty two, and the reign of Darius Codomannus, Ant. 336, must see that he could never have reached to this last; so that either we must admit two Sanballats, and two sons-in-law of the priestly race, or suppose that Josephus has misplaced him in the reign of Darius Codomannus instead of Darius Notus, and in the high-priesthood of Jaddua instead of that of Joiada, where the text places him †.

This is what the learned Prideaux (9) has taken a great deal of pains to prove; we shall refer the reader to him, because the argument would carry us too far. We shall observe by the by, that, upon his supposition, the Manasses, whom the same Josephus makes to succeed his nephew Eleazar (10), will not be the Manasses, who married Sanballat's daughter, and was expelled by Nehemiah (11).

As for Sanballat being called Cuthean by Josephus, and Horonite by Ezra, the latter we have shewn to have been given him from Horonaim the place of his birth, and that of Cuthean was a name of reproach, by which not only that historian, but all the Jews, called the Samaritans.

Josephus informs us ; only the latter says, that he died in an advanced age <sup>u</sup> ; and indeed even at the time where his book ends, he must have been at least seventy years of age. In his days, and about the eleventh year of Darius Notus, died the high-priest Eliashib, after he had enjoyed the pontifical dignity forty years ; he was succeeded by his son Joiada, called by Josephus Judas <sup>w</sup>, the unworthy father of that Manasses whom Nehemiah had forced to retire into Samaria for the sake of his beloved wife (S). Whilst that governor lived, he supported his character by the most exemplary zeal for religion, justice, and the good of his nation ; and the dignity of his office by a magnificent hospitality. The usual provision of his table was an ox, six fat sheep, with fowl, fish, wine, and other things in proportion ; at which he entertained, besides an hundred and fifty of the head rulers, who eat constantly with him, all the strangers of any distinction, who came from other countries to Jerusalem ; all which he supported at his own private charge, and without receiving any of the allowance which was usually paid to the governors of that province, which had pre-

(S) Josephus adds (12), that Sanballat, to compensate him for the loss of his right to the Jewish priesthood, which his birth intitled him to, promised to make him high-priest of Samaria, and to bestow on him the highest place in the whole province. In order to which, he would cause a temple to be built on mount Gerizim like unto that of Jerusalem, of which he should have the high-priesthood.

Accordingly, as our author goes on, that governor having gone over from the Persians to Alexander the Great, obtained of him, as a reward for his services, leave to build that temple, and made his son-in-law high-priest of it, so that all the apostate Jews repaired to it ; which still more increased the hatred of those of Judæa, who from that time looked upon them as schismatics.

This story carries as flagrant an anachronism (unless we suppose two Sanballats as that we spoke of in the last note ; that author tells us farther, that Manasses succeeding afterwards to the high-priesthood of Jerusalem in right of his great uncle (or, as others read it, nephew) came and took possession of it ; but he doth not inform us how or whether he renounced his schism, nor how he was received by those of Judæa (13). We shall give a further account of the building of this Samaritan temple in the next section.

number of Jews captives, part of which he sent into Egypt, and part into Hyrkania, along the Caspian sea. . . . Whether they had engaged with the Phœnicians against that prince, or by what other way they had disobliged him, our authors do not tell us, nor whether his resentment stopped here, or was felt in any other part of Judæa. . . . About ten years after, that is, in the eighteenth year of that monarch's reign, died Johanan their high-priest in the thirty-second year of his high-priesthood, and was succeeded by his son Jaddua; and three years after Ochus was poisoned by Bagoas, who set up his youngest son Arsaces on the Persian throne, who was soon after succeeded by Darius III. *

IN the fourth year of this prince's reign, the Jews gave him such an instance of their loyalty, as plainly shewed they had not forgot what they had suffered from Ochus for siding with his enemies. Alexander the Great having resolved upon the siege of Tyre, and being informed that the Tyrians, a nation wholly given to trade, received all their provisions from Judæa, Samaria, and Galilee, sent to Jaddua the then high-priest, to demand that supply of them, which they were wont to pay to the Persians. Jaddua modestly excused himself from complying with his demand, alledging, that his oath of fidelity to Darius did not permit him to transfer that tribute to an enemy. Alexander, provoked at this refusal, had no sooner completed the siege of Tyre, than he marched strait to Jerusalem, resolved to punish the Jews with as great severity as he had done the Tyrians. He was advancing with full speed towards their metropolis, when the high-priest and the rest of the people, sensible of their imminent danger, had recourse to God, and by their prayers, sacrifices, and other acts of humiliation, obtained a gracious promise from him, that he would protect his temple and people from the approaching calamity. It was communicated to Jaddua in a dream, in which he was commanded to go and meet the threatening conqueror, in his pontifical robes, at the head of all his priests, in their proper habits, and attended with the rest of the people dressed in white garments. Jaddua obeyed on the next morning, and having caused the gates of the city to be opened, marched in solemn procession at the head of his attendance, to an eminence called Sapha or rather Tzaphab, because it commanded the prospect of the whole city and temple.

As soon as the venerable prelate was got near enough for Alexander to view the magnificence of his dress, especially the sacred name of God engraven on the front of his mitre, he was seized with such an awful respect, that to the great surprize of his retinue, who were already glutting their eyes with the prospect of a rich plunder, and a dreadful slaughter, the monarch advanced towards him, and with a religious kind of veneration bowed to him, embraced him, and paid an adoration to the sacred inscription on his forehead. Whilst the Syrians, Phœnicians, and others that were present, stood amazed at the sight, Parmenio, with his usual familiarity, ventured to ask him the reason of his unexpected behaviour, and was answered by the king, that this respect, which was not paid to the priest, but to his God, was an acknowledgment for a vision of the like nature, which he had favoured him with at Dio, in which he promised to him the conquest of Persia, and encouraged him in this expedition by a person with much the same aspect, and the same venerable dress with the pontiff now before him. He then gave orders to march on to Jerusalem, and was attended thither by the high-priest and his retinue, and conducted to the temple, where he caused a great number of victims to be offered to the God of the Jews. Here the priests shewed him the book of Daniel, wherein it was foretold, that a Greek should in time conquer the Persian empire; and Alexander, understanding it of himself, went away highly satisfied with what he had seen and heard. On the next day he called the Jews together, and asked them what request they had to make to him, and was answered by the high-priest, that they only begged of him the liberty of living according to their laws, to have the free exercise of their religion, and to be exempt from tribute every sabbatic or seventh year, seeing they were forbidden by their law to sow or reap in those years. The same favour they likewise begged of him in the behalf of their brethren, who dwelt in Babylon and Media; all which being readily granted by the conqueror, he offered the Jews to receive into his army all that were willing to lift under his standards, and to grant them the free exercise of their religion, which drew a great number of them into his service <sup>d</sup>.

THE Samaritans, on the other hand, less scrupulous about their oath of fidelity, had shewed themselves more complying to that monarch's demands; and, besides other supplies, had sent him eight thousand men to assist him at the siege of Tyre. As soon therefore as they were informed of the king's disposition towards the Jews, they began to entertain some hopes, that this was a proper time to apply to him for some such-like grants for themselves, to which their late services, they thought, did better intitle them than the Jews disobedience to his orders. Besides, they were always ready to claim kindred with them, whenever matters went well on their side; but as ready to drop, or even renounce it, whenever they saw them in any danger or disgrace. Scarce therefore was the king got out of Jerusalem, before they came in great pomp to invite him to honour their city and temple (B). Alexander did seemingly give

(B) Josephus expressly mentioning this temple, doth plainly shew, that it was built long before Alexander; and not, as he elsewhere tells us, by leave of that monarch obtained by Sanballat, whilst he was with him at the siege of Tyre; for that siege lasted but seven months; and supposing that he had stopt another two months at the siege of Gaza, as the same author pretends, yet all this put together would scarce have sufficed to lay the foundations of such a great building, much less for the finishing it.

But, as the learned Usser observes, it is not likely that he should take Gaza in his way from Tyre to Jerusalem, because this last did lie at some days journey's distance on this side of Gaza, so that in that case he must be supposed to have past it by, and then returned to it again with his army; and who can believe, that he would penetrate so far into Judæa, and leave Jerusalem untaken, especially when he breathed nothing but revenge against that metropolis (14)?

Add to this, that all other writers of Alexander's wars tell us, that he went directly into Egypt after the taking of Gaza. However, granting he spent those two months in that siege, what are nine months towards rearing such a building? For this and some other reasons, there have not been wanting those who have looked upon this contest between the Jews and Samaritans, as an invention of the Jewish historian, trumped up to give a kind of preference to his own nation,

But this is perhaps saying too much; however, a temple there was built upon mount Garizim, which, if finished in Alexander's time, must have been began long before his coming into Judæa, let the Samaritans have their permission from which soever of the Persian monarchs; though, if we were to venture our conjecture, might it not have been obtained from Ochus, and about the time when the Jews had incurred his displeasure, either for siding with the Phœnicians, or some other misdemeanor; and might not the Samaritans, who watched all opportunities to get the better of

give them a gracious reception, but put off the desired visit till his return from Egypt. They then petitioned that they might, like their brethren of Judæa, be exempted from the tribute of every seventh year, since, like them, they neither sowed nor reaped in those years. They were thereupon asked, what country they were of? and upon their answering that they were Hebrews, but called Sichemites by the Sidonians, the question was put peremptorily to them, whether they were Jews? But they, afraid perhaps to answer in the affirmative, in a place where they could be so easily confuted, did then disown the title; and the king, who had not leisure then to inquire further about it, dismissed them with a promise, that he would examine their claim after his return. He did so accordingly, and granted them the same exemption as he had the Jews; for those Samaritans who had assisted him at the siege of Tyre, having likewise signalized themselves in Egypt, which that prince conquered with a surprizing quickness; it is not improbable, this immunity was granted to them as a reward for their services. In the mean time the temple at mount Garizim proved the source of continual evils to the Jews, and the constant asylum of their apostate brethren, who never failed to go over to the Samaritans, as soon as they found themselves in danger of punishment for any enormous crimes.

Alexander at the same time was no less kind to the Jews, Jews seeing a great number of whom, at his return into Alexandria, he fled at Alexandria. he settled there among other nations, and endowed with many privileges and immunities, allowing them the free exercise of their religion, and admitting them to the same franchises and liberties with his own Macedonians<sup>c</sup>. But what gave them the greatest advantage over their Samaritan rivals was,

them, have so far ingratiated themselves into that exasperated prince's favour, by renouncing, as usual, all kindred with them, as to obtain a grant to build a temple for themselves?

This once supposed, there will be time enough for that work to be finished by or even before Alexander's time, and the Sanballat of Nehemiah may have probably lived to have laid the foundation of it. This will likewise in some measure account for Josephus's anachronism, which may be no other than a wilful oversight, it being a less disgrace to his nation to represent this grant as obtained, not for any misbehaviour of theirs, but for the services done by the Samaritans.

an insurrection made in their capital against his favourite Andromachus, whom he had made governor of Syria and Palestine. The Samaritans, upon some discontent against him, ran in a tumultuous manner to his palace, set it on fire, and burnt him in it; which so exasperated that monarch, that he caused all that had had a hand in that atrocious deed to be put to death, and the rest to be driven out of the city, which he repeopled with his own Macedonians, and granted the rest of their territories to the Jews<sup>g</sup>. From this time, those that survived the slaughter having settled themselves at Shechem, that city became the metropolis of the Samaritan sect<sup>h</sup>. As for those eight thousand, who had served under him, he sent and settled them in Thebais, the remotest part of Egypt, to prevent their raising any fresh insurrection among their countrymen. As for the Jews, they continued still in his favour both in Palestine and out of it, only those that were in his army were like to have forfeited it, by their stiff refusal to assist at the rebuilding of the temple of Belus, which that monarch had began. They urged in vain, that their law, of which they were promised the free exercise, forbade them to have a hand in such an idolatrous work; they were made to undergo some severe punishments, but, to his surprise, they bore them with such invincible constancy, that, being more overcome by it than by their other pleas, he discharged them from his service, and sent them into their own country<sup>i</sup>; and he himself dying soon after, left his empire in the confused state we have seen in a former volume*. Four years after him died also Jaddua the Jewish high-priest, in the twentieth year of his pontificate, and was succeeded by his son Onias, who enjoyed that dignity about one and twenty years.

At first it was, as we have seen elsewhere, given, together with Syria and Phœnicia, to Leomedon the Mitylenian, one of Alexander's generals<sup>k</sup>, and confirmed to him by a second partition treaty; but he being soon after stripped of the other two by Ptolemy, Judæa was the only one which stood firm to him from a sense of their oath of allegiance; so that the Egyptian king was forced to invade it with a powerful army, and accordingly did lay close siege to Jerusalem. The place, being strongly fortified by art and nature, might have found him work enough, had not a superstitious fear of breaking the sabbath prevented the besieged making any defence on that day; which being understood by the king, he caused it to be stormed on the sabbath, and took the city accordingly without any opposition <sup>1</sup> (C). This did not, however, prevent his treating them with great severity; he carried near a hundred thousand of them captives into Egypt, but reflecting soon after on their known loyalty to their former conquerors, and the sacred regard they paid to their oaths, and being by the taking of Jerusalem become master of Judæa and Samaria, he committed the keeping of several considerable garisons both here and in Egypt to them; and having made them swear allegiance to him, and to his heirs and successors, he endowed them with the same privileges they had enjoyed under the Macedonians. an insurrection made in their capital against his favourite Andromachus, whom he had made governor of Syria and Palestine. The Samaritans, upon some discontent against him, ran in a tumultuous manner to his palace, set it on fire, and burnt him in it; which so exasperated that monarch, that he caused all that had had a hand in that atrocious deed to be put to death, and the rest to be driven out of the city, which he repeople with his own Macedonians, and granted the rest of their territories to the Jews<sup>s</sup>. From this time, those that survived the slaughter having settled themselves at Shechem, that city became the metropolis of the Samaritan sect<sup>h</sup>. As for those eight thousand, who had served under him, he sent and settled them in Thebais, the remotest part of Egypt, to prevent their raising any fresh insurrection among their countrymen. As for the Jews, they continued still in his favour both in Palestine and out of it, only those that were in his army were like to have forfeited it, by their stiff refusal to assist at the rebuilding of the temple of Belus, which that monarch had began. They urged in vain, that their law, of which they were promised the free exercise, forbade them to have a hand in such an idolatrous work; they were made to undergo some severe punishments, but, to his surprise, they bore them with such invincible constancy, that, being more overcome by it than by their other pleas, he discharged them from his service, and sent them into their own country<sup>i</sup>; and he himself dying soon after, left his empire in the confused state we have seen in a former volume*. At first it was, as we have seen elsewhere, given, together with Syria and Phœnicia, to Leomedon the Mitylenian, one of Alexander's generals<sup>k</sup>, and confirmed to him by a second partition treaty; but he being soon after stripped of the other

maritans.

By this time the Samaritans, who daily increased in number, strength and wealth, by the continual concourse of apostate Jews, made Shechem their metropolis, enlarged and beautified it, and, as we hinted before, made it the head of their schismatic sect; and as they were neither so scrupulous about their oaths of allegiance, nor so tenacious of the precepts of the Mosaic law, as their rivals of Judæa were, they seldom made any scruple to side with the strongest, and, if occasion required, to comply with the will of their princes, even in things which were absolutely forbidden by their law. This policy, which they never lost sight of, as the sequel will soon shew, not only freed them from the many persecutions which the Jews underwent, but made them fare much better under every government than they, so that from this time, not only those who fled from punishment from Judæa, but a much greater number came over to them to avoid, either persecution on account of their law, or the tyranny and oppression of their governors. As therefore this sect became so numerous and powerful, as to make a considerable figure in the Jewish history, our readers will doubtless expect to be informed how far their religion agreed or differed from that of the Jews; and by what strange arguments they have, ever since their separation, endeavoured to prove their claim of precedence to, and to retort the imputation of schism upon them, since we have already seen that they were originally a mixture of Cutheans and other foreign nations, sent thither by the Assyrian kings instead of the ten tribes carried away captive by them, and now become a more mixed and mongrel nation, by the constant resort and incorporation of all the renegade Jews. This digression, if it be really such, is so much the more necessary here, because it will be impossible without it to dive into those perpetual jars and disputes that have been ever since, and are still carried on, between those two nations with the utmost irreconcilable hatred. However, that we may contract as much as possible, we shall only give here what is most material concerning their tenets, and throw all their fabulous authorities and pretences, as well as those of the Jews against them, in the margin (E). The following

This Jewish colony grew in time so numerous, as to have a thousand of them put to death for one mutiny in Vespasian's time; and yet in a succeeding reign, they proved strong enough to master the whole province, and, as Xiphilinus tells us in the life of Trajan, to massacre two hundred thousand inhabitants of other nations.

(E) We shall begin with the account which the Samaritans give of their origin, in opposition to that which we have from the sacred books, concerning them: 1st, They boast themselves descended from Joseph by Ephraim; they pretend, that when Joshua entered into the promised land, he caused a temple to be built upon mount Garizim, and appointed Ruz of the seed of Aaron to officiate as high-priest, from whom they boast to have an exact genealogy and uninterrupted succession, down to this very time. They neither own Jeroboam's schism (18), nor the transmigration of the ten tribes (19), but give the following account of their going out, and returning into the land.

The kings of Jerusalem and Syria, say they, having revolted against Bachtnezzar (so they call Nebuchadnezzar), he came and took Jerusalem, and went from thence to the Shechemites, whom he ordered to leave that country in seven days, under pain of being all massacred, which they did accordingly. The strangers whom he settled in Judaea and Shechem soon after could not live there, because the fairest fruits of the land were tainted with a mortal poison; the king of Babylon having thereupon consulted some of the antient inhabitants, was answered, that the only remedy to that evil, was to send the Hebrews thither again; which that prince having agreed to, a place of rendezvous was appointed for the Jews and Shechemites, to return together each into his own land.

Here a dispute arose between them, whether they should go and rebuild the temple of Jerusalem, or that of Garizim. Zerubbabel was for the former, and Sanballat for the latter, and each pleaded the sanction of the pentateuch, and each pretended that the copy of his antagonist was corrupted, that of the former being expressly for Jerusalem, and the other for Garizim.

To end the dispute, they agreed, that that copy, which withstood the fiery trial, should be the authentic one; upon which Ze- following articles therefore are a short summary of their faith in common with, and in opposition to, that of the Jews.

rubbabel having flung his own into the fire, it was immediately consumed, whereas that of the Samaritan chief came three times untouched out of the flames.

This miracle, they add, having determined the controversy in their favour, the king honoured them with rich presents, and sent Sanballat at the head of his ten tribes, to take possession of mount Garizim, where he rebuilt the temple in dispute. This account they give us out of an old Samaritan chronicle, which they pretend to be of great antiquity and authority, but those who have examined it, tell us, that it was written in the reign of some of the christian emperors, and after Constantine (20), unless we suppose it to have been continued from time to time. However, let the chronicle bear what date it will, it is plain by the Samaritan woman's question to our Saviour (21), Our fathers worshipped on this mountain, and ye say, that Jerusalem is the place, that they claimed this authority long before; and accordingly, their pentateuch, of which we shall speak by and by, among other interpolations, has changed the word Ebal for that of Garizim, where-ever those two mountains come in competition.

The Jews, on their side, have not been sparing of their fictions, as if they had chosen to confute their antagonists by this way, rather than by the authority of the sacred books. Josephus tells us of much such another contest that happened in Egypt, between those of his nation and the Samaritans about these two temples; and which arose to such a height, that it was like to end in a sedition, had not Ptolemy Philometor put an end to it in the following manner (22).

He ordered the contending parties to bring their cause before him, and to have it pleaded by proper persons, with this condition, that those who were cast should lose their heads. There appeared but one advocate for the Jews, viz. Andronicus the son of Alessalami; but he pleaded his cause so well against his two antagonists, whom our author names Sabbæus and Theodore, that he gained his point, and they lost their lives (23).

Another antient author (24), whom the Jews pretend to have lived before the destruction of Jerusalem, but by his mentioning of the Saracen empire, must have wrote at least six hundred years after (25); tells us, that when Ezra and Nehemiah were rebuilding the temple, the Samaritans came with an army of a hundred and eighty thousand men to besiege Jerusalem; but that those two

1st, They believe in one God, and in his servant Moses, Their religion. and that Garizim is the only place of God's worship. The

Jews, say they, follow other teachers, other precepts, taken from their other books, traditions, and expositions; we stick close to the five books of Moses, and reject all other writings, all other authority and interpretation, and guide our faith and practice solely by the precepts of our law-giver. Accordingly they never admitted any other books but the pentateuch (F).

2dly. They always circumcise their males on the eighth day, never deferring it upon any account, as the Jews do, some of them till the hour of death (G).

3dly, They never allow themselves to have two wives, or to marry their nieces; but the Jews do both.

4thly, They are bound to wash themselves every morning, after either matrimonial converse, or any accidental defilement, so that they look upon every vessel and household-stuff they touch before such an ablution, to be polluted.

5thly, They observe the sabbath with the greatest strictness, never meddling with their wives on that night, lighting no chiefs, having assembled three hundred priests, did pronounce the higher excommunication against them †. These priests were followed by three hundred young men, who held each a copy of the Mosaic law in one hand, and a trumpet in the other, which they blew whilst the priests were excommunicating them, upon which they were immediately put to flight.

(F) In consequence of this, they reject all the prophetical and historical books, as written in favour of the Jews, and especially of the house of David; they despise the Jewish pretence of oral tradition, and all their targums and talmuds.

They value themselves for having preserved the antient Hebrew character, and curie the new one, which was since introduced by Ezra, whom they brand with the name of impostor, and who, they pretend, substituted it to the Mosaic one, for the sake of those other books which he foisted into the Jewish canon (26).

(G) Especially in countries where they are not tolerated, such as France, Portugal, Spain, &c, and where, for fear of being discovered by the scar of circumcision, they wholly neglect it, and outwardly conform with the religion of the country for the sake of trade. Some of them, however, when they are grown either rich enough, or old and qualmish, will come over into England, Holland, &c. to be circumcised. As for those that die without circumcision, some of their friends generally come and circumcise them in their coffin, and lay the prepuce by them, after which the coffin is immediately nailed, and carried to the grave.

fires, nor stirring from their houses, unless to go to the synagogue, where they read some portion of the pentateuch, offer up their prayers to, and sing the praises of, God.

6thly, Of all their solemn festivals, the passover is by them esteemed the chief; they likewise observe the other two of pentecost and of tabernacles with great exactness, and the grand fast of expiation with uncommon strictness.

7thly, They never offer any sacrifice but on mount Gazizim <sup>P</sup>.

8thly, They boast a continued succession of priests from Ruz the son of Phineas, the catalogue of which is preserved by them with the utmost strictness; and their high-priest always makes his residence at Shechem, now called Naplouse, from whence he issues out his directions to the whole sect for keeping their festivals, and whatever relates to the Mosaic observances (H). From this short scantling of their faith and practice,

(H) This sect is still very numerous, not only in their metropolis, but in Damascus, Gaza, Cairo, and other parts of the Ottoman empire, besides those which are dispersed into the northern parts of Europe and Asia. But so ignorant are those of Turky, especially of cosmography, whatever they may be as to their religion, that they took the English Jews to be of their sect, and England to be only a considerable city (27), as appears by a letter they wrote to them some time since, and mentioned by the author last quoted; but if they really held those tenets which the Jews attribute to them, they must have been no less ignorant in point of their religion. Among other errors they charge them with, that of believing the godhead to be a corporeal being would be sufficient to shew their stupidity, but Credat Judæus.

Epiphanius, who ranks them in the catalogue of his heretics (28), tells us, that they worshipped the Teraphims, which Rachel had stolen from her father Laban, and which they digged up from under the oak, where Jacob had buried them; but, it is likely, he took up this calumny upon some Jewish authority. He adds, that they were, like the Jews, divided into four sects (28), and gives us there the different tenets of each, but they are not worth dwelling upon.

A modern traveller informs us, that in a letter they wrote to him (29), they acknowledged the book of Joshua; but they meant most probably their chronicle we have lately mentioned, and which they style the book of Joshua. However, a more rightepractice, one would be apt to conclude, that, except those points which related to their schism, they had been much stricter observers of the Mosaic law, than the Jews; but, whatever they may have proved in later times, we shall meet with such flagrant instances of the contrary in the sequel of this and the next section, as will easily convince how ready they were, upon the least danger of persecution or severe usage from their governors, to sacrifice their religion to their interest and safety. However, even in this one point of their schism, it is manifest, they were guilty of most flagrant forgery in corrupting their pentateuch in many places, in order to colour their setting up a new temple with some shew of divine authority. It is true, all the variations of this book are not of the same heinous nature, some of them seem even imputable to the ignorance of the transcribers from the new Chaldee of Ezra to the old Samaritan character, such as their often mistaking of letters, in the former by reason of their similitude, as the beth for the caph, the daleth for the resh, which in the Samaritan are very unlike. Others again may be looked upon as explanatory interpolations, such as we have observed, Joshua and his successors, down to Ezra and beyond, have thought necessary to add to the text. But there are certainly several notorious ones, which could not but be designedly made to support their cause against their Jewish antagonists. The reader may see some few of them in the margin (I), enough, however, to convince him that this Samaritan

ous judge than the Jewish rabbies has summed up their character in few words, when he told them, that they worshipped they knew not what, and that salvation was of the Jews (30).

(I) We have already taken notice of their substituting the word Garizim to that of Ebal, in that place of Deuteronomy, where God commands the Israelites to build an altar (31); according to which corruption, they pretend that Joshua actually built the said altar on Garizim, and that it is the same they have sacrificed upon ever since

2dly, They have interpolated, between the twenty-fifth and twenty sixth verses of the eighteenth chapter of Exodus, all that we read in the first of Deuteronomy from the ninth to the fourteenth verse inclusive; and in the tenth of Numbers, are inserted the sixth, seventh, and eighth verses of the first of Deuteronomy, between the tenth and eleventh verses. ritan is not the only true authentic copy, because in the old Hebrew character, and that of Ezra only a transcript of it, because in the new introduced Chaldee, as some learned men have thought, and particularly a modern one<sup>9</sup>, who has given it by far the preference above the Jewish; those who are acquainted with his notions, need not be told what induced him to this unaccountable partiality.

How and when this manuscript came into the hands of the Samaritans, is hard to guess; the general opinion is, that it was brought into Samaria by the priest, whom Ezarhaddon sent to instruct the new inhabitants of that country. The book was not unknown to several antient fathers, particularly Origen and St. Jerom, who both understood the Hebrew tongue; but they have given us no light about it. The opinion of some learned moderns<sup>r</sup> is, that it was brought to Samaria by Manasses, Sanballat's son-in-law lately mentioned, and that it was transcribed from that of Ezra, since we find in it all the emendations and explanations which that inspired scribe is supposed to have made to those five books; and consequently could be of no older date, much less have been brought by that Hebrew priest above-mentioned (K).

However, that pentateuch, the reader may see carefully collected by the learned Hottinger (32), and in the collations made in the last volume of Walton's polyglot.

(K) If it be asked, how he could instruct those strangers in the worship of God, unless he had brought some such book along with him from the place of his captivity? some answer, that he taught them no more than he knew by tradition (33); others distinguish between the whole pentateuch and an epitome of the law contained in some of the chapters of Deuteronomy (34), which is that which they suppose he brought with him to Samaria, since both kings and priests were bound to keep a copy of it written with their own hand. Their reason for so thinking is, that if they had had the whole pentateuch, it is hardly to be supposed they would have continued so long in their idolatry. But here they forget that even this epitome contains as strong and severe prohibitions and threatenings against it, as can be found in any other part of the Mosaic books; so that it is more likely their attachment to their country gods, rather than the want of proper books

However, each system has its difficulties, which are not easily solved ; all that we shall add concerning this book is, that besides this copy written in their old character in the Hebrew Two ver- tongue, they had another written in the vulgar language spok- sions of it. en among them, because, like the Jews, they had forgot the old Hebrew, and were accustomed to a mongrel mixture of Assyrian, Babylonish, and Chaldee. Besides this, they had a Greek version of it for the sake of their hellenistical brethren, as the Jews had the septuagint ; and it is probable, that this was the version which is mentioned by several antient fathers<sup>c</sup>, since they cannot be supposed to have understood either the original one, or the vulgar version of it. The old Hebrew copy did afterwards remain unknown to the christians during near ten centuries. Scaliger was the first modern who How got intelligence of it ; after which it was brought over into brought Europe, and printed in the polyglots of Paris and London, into Eu- the latter of which is by far the best and most correct, as well rope.

to instruct them, was the cause of their so long dividing their worship between the God of Israel and their own.

A late critic has made a bold, but strange, push to reconcile all these difficulties, by absurdly supposing the pentateuch to have been written on the other side Euphrates, by the priest, who was sent from thence into Samaria, for the instruction of those strangers. To this end, he, it seems, thought fit to give them a short sketch of the creation, flood, and other occurrences, that happened before the giving of the Mosaic law ; and that he wrote it in the old Hebrew, because he was unacquainted with the Chaldee ; and that this happening precisely at the time, when the Jewish volume of the law was found out by the high priest and brought to Josiah, he got a copy of it, and inserted it at the end of his own work, as very proper to bring men to the knowledge of the one true God ; and, lastly, that the Jews, finding nothing to object against the author or his work, have adopted the latter as conformable to their law and history. This critic has not ventured to set his name to his book, but sent it abroad under a fictitious title (35) ; however, Ex ungue leonem, he was not long undiscovered or unconfuted.

Upon the whole, the general opinion is, that this pentateuch was brought by the priest sent by Ezrah into Samaria, and that after the rupture of the Jews and Samaritans, the latter wilfully corrupted those places of it which made against them, and consequently, that the Jewish one is by far the more authentic of the two.

(L) Scaliger, having received from the Shechemites an account of this pentateuch, by a letter which he published anno 1676, acquainting him among other things with this pentateuch; did in another work (36) complain, that none of the learned of Europe had endeavoured to procure some copies of it, seeing it might probably be of great service in adjusting the scripture chronology. This awakened the curiosity of archbishop Usher, who, as he tells us in his letter to L. Capellus, had observed, that this book had been quoted by several antient fathers and other writers, down to Gaza and Syncellus, and particularly by the learned Origen in his book against Celsus. From that time this great prelate spared neither pains nor cost, till he had procured five or six copies of it from Syria and Palestine, and compared them with the Hebrew; and here he thought he had found out the person who had corrupted them, namely, one Dositheus, mentioned by Origen against Celsus; but this discovery has not been universally received. However, it is from his copies that Walton printed that pentateuch in his polyglot, (37); since then several other copies were procured from the same place by other learned persons in Europe (38). Those who are willing to know more of the Samaritans and their pentateuch, may consult, besides the letters of Scaliger, Leudolph, and Usher abovementioned, the authors quoted in the margin (39).

nical government of Antiochus <sup>u</sup> (M). Thus was Judæa become the subject of the disputes of, and scene of war between Antigonus king of Upper Asia, Seleucus king of Syria, and Ptolemy king of Egypt. The partizans of this last pretended, that he had not undertaken to put Asia under the government of Seleucus; but upon condition that Cæle-Syria and Phœnicia should be relinquished to him. Those of Seleucus on the contrary maintained that Ptolemy was no further concerned in the war, than to help him to conquer those provinces allotted to him; in proof whereof they urged, that, after the defeat of Antigonus, Lysimachus and Cassander had assigned those provinces to Seleucus <sup>w</sup>. Accordingly we find;

(M) Among those Jews whom Ptolemy's kindness drew into Egypt, Josephus (40) mentions Hezechias, one of the chief-priests, a man of learning and probity, and about sixty years of age, who became acquainted with Hecataeus the Abderite, a person trained up under Alexander the Great, and now in great credit at the Egyptian court. Him Hezechias did so well inform of the religion, laws, and customs of the Jews, that he wrote a history of that nation down from Abraham to his time. The book is now lost; but Josephus quotes so many passages out of him in favour of the Jews, that a heathen writer, who lived in Trajan's time; did very much question either the genuineness of the book, or the sincerity of the author (41). Had he been better acquainted with them, he would never have called either in question; and it is more than probable, that Hecataeus's great opinion of them procured the nation greater favours from Ptolemy, than they might have otherwise met with.

The Jewish historian quotes another story out of the same author, to shew how far his nation was averse to the superstitions of the heathens. It is of one Mosollam a Jew, who was such an excellent marksman, that he shot a bird dead with his bow, whilst a soothsayer in company was persuading them to observe its motion, and steer their course by that of the bird. This action having drawn some bitter invectives against our Jew, from his superstitious fellow-travellers, he only laughed at their folly, for expecting to learn their fortune from a bird, that was so palpably ignorant of its own. Whether Mosollam was more minded to display his skill in shooting, or exploding the superstition of other nations, 'tis but too plain, those of his own were generally of another mind, with respect to soothsaying, astrology, divinations, and such-like superstitious trash.

that this last enjoyed that of Judæa some while, with a tax of three hundred talents of silver, upon condition that the Jews should be governed by their own laws, and that their high-priests should be their only governors *.

THIS prince very much imitated the clemency and generosity of the Egyptian king, a character which was quite opposite to that of Antigonus, who was of such fierce nature, that he stuck at no cruelty, falsehood, or tyranny that served his turn. This made great numbers of the Jews to fall away likewise from that tyrant to Seleucus, who gave them much the same privileges and franchises that his competitor did in Egypt. He built sixteen cities in Lesser Asia, which he, from his father, called Antioch, nine he called by his own name, and six by that of his mother Laodicea; three from his first wife Apamea, and one from Stratonice his last wife; in all these he settled such considerable colonies of the Jews, especially at Antioch in Syria, that they became almost as considerable a part of those cities, as they were at Alexandria. Hence that nation came to spread themselves over Syria and Lesser Asia, whilst Judæa became still thinner of its own inhabitants, till it was again recovered by Ptolemy; after which they came still over to him from the the provinces of Antiochus, and still increased the number of those whom he found in Babylon; from all whom he received such considerable services, that he spared no favours nor encouragement to fasten them to his interest.

SOON after the recovery of Judæa by Ptolemy Soter, died Simon the Jewish high-priest in the ninth year of his pontificate †. He had succeeded his father Onias, and had been so eminent for his sanctity and integrity, which shone in all his actions, that he was surnamed the just. He was the first pontiff of that name, and the excellent character which the author of Ecclesiasticus gives of him ‡, shews how highly he deserved the surname which his nation had given him. But he was no less remarkable for his other virtues, as a Jewish prince and governor, witness his repairing and fortifying the temple and the city with high and strong walls, his famous cistern covered with brass, which he caused to be made in Jerusalem, as a reservoir for water, and which was of such capacious circumference, that the author compares it to a sea; but his most considerable work was the finishing of the canon of the Old Testament, of which we have already spoken (N). He left a son named Onias, but he being then but an infant, Eleazar, Simon's brother was substituted high-priest in his stead. He executed this office fifteen years, but with this difference; that whereas all the high-priests before had

(N) It has been already observed, that the books of Ezra, Nehemiah, and of the chronicles, could not have been inserted into the canon by those two inspired writers; first, because there are in them some marginal corrections, which must have been inserted by some of their successors; and, secondly, because some genealogies are carried down vastly beyond their time, some even down to that of Alexander the Great

The book of Esther likewise seems to have been written after their time, and, as some think, the prophecies of Malachy. As therefore this Simon the Just is by all the Jews mentioned as the last of the great synagogue we have elsewhere spoken of, and was a man of such eminent piety and learning, it is not unreasonable to suppose, that he put the finishing stroke to the sacred code, either by inserting the books above-mentioned, or, if they had been received before, by revising and giving a final sanction to them.

As for the genealogies, whoever continued them, that work seems to have been done before him. Had he been the author of them, it is likely he would have brought them down nearer his time.

However, from his pontificate is dated the compleating of the sacred canon of the Old Testament, which was thenceforward received and conveyed without revisal or correction; from this time the Jewish doctors applied themselves wholly to study, explain, and comment upon them, and their expositions were in time received with as great submission as the sacred books themselves.

This is that Simon of whom the Talmudists tell us so many wonders, some of which we have formerly mentioned †, such as that during his priesthood the scape-goat was always broken in pieces down the precipice, which was an omen of God's acceptance; but after his death the Saracens used to catch and eat it; that the ribbon tied about the neck of it always appeared white, another good omen, but after him it appeared of a red; they tell us likewise (‡), that during his time the western branch of the sacred candlestick never went out; that the shew-bread, and two loaves of the first-fruits, used to be multiplied to such a degree, as to suffice all the priests who were then upon duty; that two sticks thrown on the fire of the altar kept it burning and clear all the whole day; with some other such tokens of the divine favour, which ended with his death. All which, those who are acquainted with the allegorical language of the Talmudists, are so far from un-had sat as presidents of the synagogue, or grand council of the Jews, Simon was succeeded in this last dignity by one Antigonus of Socho, a man of great learning and piety<sup>a</sup>. This man, who the Jews tell us, was the master of Saddoc, the chief of the Sadducean sect, taught, that our serving of God ought to be free either from slavish fear of punishment, or from selfish hope of reward; and be wholly disinterested, and flow from the pure love and fear of that supreme being. Hence his disciple being unable to relish such a spiritual doctrine, took it into his head, that his master meant no more by it, than that there were neither rewards nor punishments, nor even life after this; which notion became in time so rife among the richer sort of Jews, that they monopolised all the great places in church and state, as we shall see in due time.

Antigonus by this became the head of a new kind of synagogue, which continued from this time to that of Jehudah Hakkodesh, the compiler of the Mishna, as the old one had from Ezra to Simon the just; the difference between them was; that the old one had bestowed their time and labour in collecting, revising, and compleating the canon of the Old Testament; the latter was wholly employed in expounding and commenting upon it. These, therefore, whom the authors of the New Testament call by different names; such as doctors, scribes, lawyers, rulers, and such like, affected to call themselves Tannaim, or traditionalists<sup>b</sup>, because they handed down their expositions and doctrines by oral tradition to their disciples; and their authority once quoted in any of their schools upon any point, either put an end to the controversy, or the recusant was looked upon as an apostate from his master; and as all other disputes in political affairs were to be decided by the law of God, of which these Tannaim were the interpreters; so they were chosen also to assist, and some of the most considerable for learning, zeal, &c. to preside in all the courts of judicature, from the Sanhedrin or great council of the nation, consisting of seventy two, down to the more inferior ones, which they had in derstanding either as literal truths, or as fictions of those writers, that they rightly look upon them as so many figurative phrases, to express the flourishing condition of the Jewish religion and commonwealth, which from that time began to go from bad to worse, till the brave Maccabees raised it again to its antient lustre.

every city; and upon this account they were also called counsellors *.

Ptolemy, surnamed Philadelphus, having succeeded his father in Egypt, the Jews found in him as great a protector as they had in Ptolemy Soter; and with this advantage, that the son, being a great lover of learning, and upon the point of rearing his noble library at Alexandria, as we have elsewhere described *, did strive to oblige them with greater favours than any of his predecessors had done, in order to obtain from them a copy of the sacred books, to be translated into Greek, and deposited there among that immense number of volumes which he had procured from all parts of the world. This version is that which is commonly known by the name of septuagint; our great Usher places the making of it in the seventh year of that monarch's reign; we have already mentioned something of it in the place above quoted, where we promised to speak more fully of it in this chapter. And indeed, when we consider how much this performance has been celebrated, not only by the most learned Jewish writers, but also by the antient fathers as well as many celebrated moderns; how much it has been cried up, as a work manifestly conducted by a miraculous providence, and as such referred to and quoted both by our Saviour and his apostles, and by all the primitive writers of the christian church; it will perhaps be expected, that we should be somewhat copious upon it. But when we reflect on the other hand, that all those eminent writers have not only blindly followed their romantic leader, but have in many cases embellished his surprizing account of this transaction; that Aristeas, the first broacher of this history, has only covered himself with the personage, if not with the name, of a heathen writer and an officer of Ptolemy's guards, that he might be the more liberal of his incense to the Jewish nation; that he is guilty of several flagrant anachronisms, and of a manifest falshood, at the very threshold of his account, in making Demetrius Phalereus, the pretended promoter of this great work, a great favourite of the king, when the contrary plainly appears from what we have heretofore said on that head in this volume †; when we consider that Josephus, Aristobulus, a Jewish peripatetic philosopher, Philo, the Talmudists, and other rabbies, either only copied, or in some cases improved upon, him; and lastly, that those antient fathers, Justin Martyr, Irenæus, Cyril, Chrysostom, Austin, Epiphanius, and others, have too greedily swallowed up the Jewish account of this pretended miraculous version, by reason of the preference which Christ and his apostles seem to have given it either to the original, or to the other versions then extant, not perhaps so much upon its being more authentic than any of them, much less than the original, as because it was the most in vogue, and best understood by the generality of the Jews; we hope, upon all these considerations our readers will easily excuse our not entering into so spacious a field, and be content with the succinct account we shall now give them of it in the margin (O).

ALL

(O) The account we have of this version, out of the book which goes under the name of Aristas, and out of those other authors who have followed him, is in substance as follows: Ptolemy Philadelphus, a great lover of learning, was enriching the noble library which had been begun by his father, when Demetrius Phalereus, who had the inspection of that work, acquainted him, that there were certain books held sacred among the Jews, which highly deserved a place in his collection, if they could by any means be procured. He advised him at the same time of a method, in all likelihood the most effectual, to prevail upon the Jewish sanhedrin to send those volumes, together with a sufficient number of learned men to Alexandria, to translate them into Greek, namely by a general redemption of all the Jewish captives that had been taken during the late wars.

Upon inquiry, the number of them was found to amount to about a hundred thousand; at which Ptolemy was so far from being discouraged, that he caused an edict to be issued out for a total release, and the sum of twenty drachms per head to be paid for their redemption out of his own treasury; so that the whole amounted to six hundred and sixty talents. Josephus, who has only abridged that author, doth yet differ from him, in that he makes the price of every redeemed slave to have been a hundred and twenty drachms, and yet the sum total to have amounted but to four hundred and fifty talents, though there were, according to him, a hundred and twenty thousand persons released (1).

After this signal favour to the Jewish nation, the king sent a splendid embassy laden with presents to Eleazar, the then Jewish high-priest; who on his side readily complied with the king's request, and sent him, with the copy of the sacred books, written in letters of gold, seventy two Jews, well skilled in the Hebrew and Greek tongues, and a letter of thanks for his noble presents, in which he congratulated him on his glorious undertaking, and wished him good success in it.

Ptolemy received the interpreters with uncommon respect, and paid such a regard to the sacred volume, that he bowed himself

ALL that we shall add here will be two or three remarks concerning this work ; the first is, that there was near that time seven times down to the ground before it ; after which he entertained his guests with suitable magnificence seven days successively, assuring them, that he should esteem the day of their arrival as an addition to the glory of his reign. They were conducted three days after into the island of Pharos, which stood about seven furlongs from Alexandria, where Demetrius placed them in a sumptuous edifice, conveniently situated near the shore, and where they immediately set about the work.

Their method, according to Aristeas, was to sit at it from six in the morning to three in the afternoon ; after which they returned into the city, where they had their victuals and other necessaries prepared for them at the king's expence. Whenever any difficulty was started, they debated it in a full assembly ; and when the point was settled, a fair transcript was made, and sent to Demetrius, till the whole version was finished, which took up only seventy or seventy-two days.

Philo, an Alexandrian Jew, who was sent on an embassy to Caius Cæsar, soon after our Saviour's death, has greatly improved the story of Aristeas, and speaks of this version as altogether miraculous (2) ; for he adds, that upon comparing the several interpretations of those seventy men, which, according to him, had been carried on by each of them separately, there was not found so much as the difference of a word between them all ; but that they had rendered every period, not only in the same sense, but in the same phrase, word, and order, throughout the whole ; from whence he infers, that they were all divinely inspired. He mentions nothing either of Aristeas or Demetrius Phalereus, probably, because he would not be suspected of having copied and enlarged the former.

Justin Martyr, who has adopted this extraordinary addition of Philo, tells us (3), that Ptolemy had caused the interpreters to be shut up, each in a separate cell, to prevent their communicating their thoughts to one another ; that by the conformity of their several translations, he might the more easily judge of the faithfulness of the whole version. He adds, that when they came to be compared together, there was such an exact conformity between them all, that the king, who looked upon it as altogether miraculous, sent the interpreters home laden with honour and with the richest presents ; and received their writings with that veneration which was due to books divinely inspired. And as a further confirmation of the whole, he tells the Greeks, to whom he writes, that he had seen those very cells, whilst he was at Alexandria, and that those time a version made of the sacred Hebrew books into Greek, and with which the Hellenist Jews were so highly delighted, that that shewed them to him assured him, that they had the whole story from undoubted tradition.

His account of this version is somewhat different, in another work of his (4), where he tells us, that Ptolemy sent to Herod king of the Jews, for those sacred books; and that upon their being sent in their original tongue and character, which were unknown in Egypt, he had been forced to send to him for some interpreters to translate them into Greek; which being likewise complied with, copies of that version were still every-where to be seen in the hands of the Hellenist Jews in his time.

After this ample testimony of the good and learned martyr, we need not wonder if so many antient fathers (5) have embraced the story, and looked upon that version as divinely inspired; and some of them have given it even the preference to the original, in those places where the difference between them could not be reconciled (6). Epiphanius, who lived about the middle of the third century, and pretends to have preserved the letter which Ptolemy wrote to the Jews to obtain this version from them, has given us a copious account of it (7); and, to what has been said by Aristeas and the other authors abovementioned, has added some other circumstances by way of improvement; such as that there were but thirty six cells, into which the interpreters were shut up by two in each, that they had no windows, but received their light from the top by sky lights; that each couple had a book given them to translate, which when finished, was conveyed to the next cell, and so on to the third, fourth, &c. and so on to all the rest, by which means each book was translated thirty six times; that they were confined to their work from morning to evening; after which each couple was conveyed in a separate boat to the royal palace, where they supped with the king; after which they were shut up, each in their separate chamber, till the next day, when they were again conveyed to their respective cells.

When the whole book of the Old Testament had gone through the thirty six couples, their versions were read before the king by thirty six readers, whilst a thirty seventh held the original in his hand, with which they were compared; and at the end were found to agree in every respect, both with the Hebrew and with each other, to such a degree of exactness, that Ptolemy looked upon those interpreters as divinely inspired, and caused their several works to be deposited in his library of Bruchium, which, as we have observed in the history of Egypt (8), held the first, as that which was called Serapium held the second rank.

The Talmuds of Jerusalem and Babylon agree in most of these particulars abovementioned, but pretend that Ptolemy sent for those seventy two Jewish elders, without acquainting them what work he designed to set them upon, till they were arrived at Alexandria, when he caused them to be all shut up, each in a separate cell, and gave them the sacred books to translate. Some of those ancient rabbies there quoted say, indeed, that he sent only for seven of them, which was indeed more than enough for the work; they all agree with the rest, that God did so direct their pens, that all their versions were exactly agreeable both to each other, and to the original.

Lastly, and to name no more, St. Clement of Alexandria (9) and Eusebius (10) quote some fragments out of one Aristobulus, a peripatetic Jew of Alexandria, who is said to have wrote a comment on the pentateuch, and to have dedicated it to Ptolemy Philometor, to whom he had been tutor. In which dedication he mentions this Greek version, which had been made by Ptolemy's command, and under the direction of Demetrius Phalereus.

The two fathers abovementioned quote therefore this comment to prove the possibility of Pythagoras, Plato, and other Greek philosophers, having taken most of their philosophy out of the sacred volumes, since they had been translated so long before in that known language.

The reader may see by what has been extracted out of all those authors, both Jewish and Christian, that the story of this version has gained considerably by every hand it has gone through; and this improvement, as well as some other variations which are found among those writers, is one main argument why the far greater part of our modern critics reject it as a Jewish device, calculated to advance the glory of that nation.

But this is not the only plausible argument against it. We have observed in the text above some material objections that are justly urged against the pretended Aristeas, who is the first writer of this story, particularly, that he was a Jew in disguise, notwithstanding his pretending to be a heathen and one of Ptolemy's guards; and this appears first from his style, which is fraught both with hebraisms and with panegyrics on the Jewish nation. 2. The praises the isle of Pharos, where it had been made by the seventy two Israelitish elders : whereas the more zealous Hebraising Jews, who looked upon it as a vile profanation of their holy religion, conceived such horror against it, that they instituted a fast in memory of it. These even add, that the day on which it was began, proved as fatal to the Israelites, as that on which Jeroboam set up the golden calves at Dan and Beth-el, and that the sky was covered with thick darkness three days successively <sup>u</sup>. The Samaritans have likewise laid claim to the glory of this version, and pretend that their high-priest, as well that of the Jews, having been invited by Ptolemy to come at the head of a number of learned men to carry on the work, upon a review of both translations, that of the Samaritans had been preferred to the Jewish one, and placed in the library of the Egyptian monarch †.

BUT whether all the books of the Old Testament were translated at once, and by the same set of men, or, as some contend for, only the five books of Moses, we have no sufficient ground to affirm ; the latter doth, however, appear the more probable of the two, from the difference of stile and exactness, which manifestly appears in them ; for that of the pentateuch is not only more faithful and agreeable to the original,

he gives to the Egyptian king and court, are not only apparently false, but seem also calculated to advance the credit of the Jews.

The vast expence which he makes Ptolemy to have been at to get this version perfected, and which, put together and computed at the most moderate rate, must have amounted to near two millions sterling ; the sending for seventy two elders, that is six out of each of the twelve tribes, at a time when the names and tribes of Israel were absorbed into that of Jews, seems only a compliment on the sanhedrin, which consisted of that number, especially considering that a much smaller one would have sufficed for the work ; the extraordinary answers which those interpreters are said to have given extempore to the king's questions ; and lastly, the story of Demetrius Phalereus being such a great favourite with that monarch, and the victory which the latter is there affirmed to have gained at sea over Antigonus, and which is mentioned by no other writer ; all these put together, render the whole account very incredible. But our design is not here to confute it, but to direct our readers to those authors who have wrote more copiously on that subject, and which he will find in the margin (11).

but seems somewhat more antient, and in the Alexandrian dialect ; whereas that of the other books is more loose and incorrect, and sometimes renders the same Hebrew word differently from that of the Mosaic ones, which seems to intimate, that they had been done by different hands, and at some distance of time. Thus much, however, is more than probable upon the whole, that if the first version went no farther than the pentateuch, the Hellenist Jews, who found so great a benefit from it, did not go long without having all the rest of the sacred volume translated in the same tongue.

The second is, that our learned Usher has fixed the time of this version to this year, as he believed the main part of the history, which we have of it under the name of Aristeas, to be true and genuine ; for had he placed it later, it could not have coincided with the time of Eleazar, who is there mentioned as the Jewish high-priest, who sent the seventy two translators into Egypt, and who died about the beginning of the following year ; and had he placed it earlier, it would have been before Ptolemy had married his sister Arsinoe ; whereas the Jewish pontiff is there introduced as complimenting that princess, in his letter to the king, as his sister and queen.

Our last and most material remark is, that whatever wonders and fables the Jews may have invented, and the Christians swallowed, concerning this version, yet it was not without the conduct of a divine providence, that these sacred books were translated into a tongue so universally known and spoken, so many centuries before the completion of those prophecies which they contained, and which were in due time to be fulfilled by and under the promised Messiah. Had those divine oracles been kept still in the hands of the Jews, and in their original Hebrew, till the preaching of the gospel, they must have lost a very considerable part of their evidence ; which by their being promulgated in so known a language, and dispersed so far and wide, is now rendered unquestionable and irrefragable. Without such a version and publication of that sacred volume, it would have been extremely difficult, notwithstanding the manifest impossibility of a combination between the Jews and the Christians, to have persuaded an unbelieving world, that those prophecies had not been stamped, after their completion, as Porphry and other enemies of christianity absurdly affirmed : whereas this version and universal dispersion of them through so many distant parts of the known world puts it beyond all question, that they were previous to their completion, at least by some centuries, and owe consequently their origin to persons divinely inspired. We have had occasion to speak of several of them in our former volumes ; volumes <sup>c</sup>; those that relate more particularly to the Messiah, will be best seen in the sequel of this chapter. We shall only observe with respect to the latter, that when the primitive fathers, who were ignorant of the Hebrew, did quote those prophecies from this septuagint version, the Hellenist Jews found themselves so streighly pinched by them, that they grew as much out of conceit with it, as they had before admired it. This dislike produced those Latin versions of it, which were afterwards known by the names of their authors, Aquila, Symmachus, and Theodotion, and, not unlikely also, that discordance, which is found in the various manuscripts of the Greek one; the antientest and most correct of all which, in the judgment of those who have thoroughly examined it, is that which is known by the name of Alexandrian, and is now in the king's library at St. James's. A further disquisition upon this head would doubtless be out of our province; and it is, we hope, sufficient to have referred our readers in the foregoing note to those critics who have treated of it more at large.

We return now to the reign of Ptolemy, under whose benign influence the Jews, enjoying all the tranquillity they could wish, made use of that interval to study and explain the sacred books. They kept open schools, and Antigonus Sochæus was at the head of them; he died in great esteem of his nation, tho' Sador and another disciple, named Baithus, forsook him and his doctrine to spread their own new-fangled epicurism. He had two successors, namely Joseph the son of Joazer, who took the title of Nassi or prince, and Joseph the son of John, who took that of Ab-beth-din, or father or president of the sanhedrin; and these did jointly read their public lectures at Jerusalem <sup>d</sup>; the Jewish chronologers, last dies. year of Ptolemy's reign.

ON the other hand, some other contending monarchs shewed no less a desire to ingratiate themselves to the Jews, particularly Antiochus, surnamed Theos, or the god, and grandson of Seleucus, granted to those of Ionia the same privileges and franchises with the Greeks. This prince held out a long and bloody war against Ptolemy Philadelphus, which was at length terminated by a treaty of marriage, wherein the former was to marry Berenice the daughter of the latter, and to repudiate his first wife Laodicea; but he having broken his contract by a series of enormous murders, as we have elsewhere related †, was become so odious to all his subjects every-where, that Ptolemy Euergetes, who had succeeded his father in Egypt, did easily dispossess him of the provinces of Syria and Cilicia, besides several other cities of Asia; all which did readily open their gates to him upon his first appearing. Euergetes, in his return from all these conquests, past through Judæa in his way to Egypt; and coming to Jerusalem, offered a great number of sacrifices at the temple there, as an acknowledgment for his late successes*. It is thought, that this preference, which that prince shewed to the God of Israel, before the deities of Egypt, was owing to his having been shewn the prophecies of Daniel, in which those great and swift conquests had been foretold. By this time, Onias II. the unworthy son of Simon the just, was entered into the pontifical office. During his minority, his uncle Eleazar the brother of Simon, had been invested with that dignity, and enjoyed it near thirty years; it is during his pontificate that the septuagint version abovementioned is supposed to have been made. When Eleazar died, Onias, though above thirty years of age, was, for some reason or other, set by from the high-priesthood, to make way for his great uncle Manasses, the son of Jaddua the uncle of Simon the just; but Manasses being then very old and dying soon after, Onias ascended the pontifical chair in the thirty second year of his age, and in the thirty sixth year of Ptolemy Philadelphus, but in an unlucky hour for the Jews. Onias, who was of a base sordid spirit, neglected every thing but hoarding up of treasure, and was like to have ruined the Jewish state by his avarice, had not a near relation of his found out a notable expedient to save it†.

Judæa had till then been taxed at the yearly tribute of twenty talents of silver, which sum his predecessors had constantly paid to the kings of Egypt; but Onias, growing more covetous as he grew older, had sunk that money into his own coffers, instead of sending it to the king's treasury. How long he had gone on in arrears, our author doth not tell us; but they were grown to such a height, that Ptolemy Euergetes thought fit to send Athenion, one of the officers of his court, to demand them of that pontiff, threatening him at the same time, that if they were not immediately payed, he would drive all the Jews out of their country, and repeople it with new colonies of his own. This threatening and unexpected demand put the whole city into the utmost consternation, and Onias, who valued neither his dignity nor nation in comparison of his money, was the only person who remained insensible of the danger; being resolved to sacrifice both to the resentment of that prince, rather than refund any part of his stolen pelf. His sister had then a son by her husband Tobias, who, though young, was highly esteemed for his piety, justice and prudence; he was then at his country seat, where his mother sent him word of the peril into which her brother's fordidness was like to involve the whole nation. Joseph, that was the noble youth's name, lost no time to come and expostulate with his uncle. He upbraided him in the strongest terms, for basely preferring his ill-gotten riches to the sacredness of his function, the safety of his country, and especially of his friends and relations; and finding him deaf to all he urged, he advised him at least to take a journey into Egypt, and endeavour to obtain a remission, either of the whole, or part of the debt. All the answer he could get from the resty old pontiff was, that he never coveted either his dignity or government, and that he was resolved to forego them both, rather than take such a long journey. There being no remedy left but to offer himself to go and apply to the Egyptian monarch, he easily obtained his uncle's consent to it. He then convened the people into the temple, the then usual place for holding their public assemblies, and there endeavoured to dissipate their fears, by promising them, that he would shortly go down into Egypt, and find some effectual means, if they approved of his enterprize, to reconcile the king to them.

His proposal having been received with universal applause, Joseph went immediately to Athenion, invited him to his house, and entertained him in a sumptuous but obliging manner, all the rest of the time he stayed in Jerusalem; and, upon his departure, made him several considerable presents. This noble carriage failed not to have the desired effect. The Egyptian deputy promised to set the whole matter in a favourable light before the king, and Joseph, on the other hand, promised to follow him soon after, and to give that monarch full satisfaction for all that had passed during his uncle's government. Both these did punctually perform their promise; Athenion, upon his arrival at court, did loudly exclaim against Onias's fordidness, but said at the same time so many things in praise of his nephew, that Ptolemy had already conceived a high esteem for him; and Joseph, on the other hand, having borrowed twenty thousand marks from the bankers of Samaria, set out for Alexandria with a handsome equipage. How he was received, and what success he met with at the Egyptian court, we have seen elsewhere*. So that having by his address obtained the farming of the provinces Cœle-Syria, Phœnicia, Judea, and Samaria, and borrowed a considerable sum of his Egyptian friends, he returned to Jerusalem, attended with an escort of two thousand men, to assist him in collecting the royal tribute, and to punish those who should refuse to pay it. The Ascalonites were the first who felt the severe effects of his authority. They had not only disobeyed his commands, but had even loaded him with bitter invectives, so that, to prevent the infection spreading further, he was forced to make a severe example of them to the rest. He caused twenty of the ring-leaders to be hanged, and confiscated their estates, out of which he sent a thousand talents to the king, with an account of what he had done. He treated the inhabitants of Scythopolis after the same manner; and these were the only ones that ventured to follow those of Ascalon; the rest, being all over-awed, did willingly open their gates, and pay their taxes, and Joseph, at the same time that he remitted them into Egypt, did from time to time send some presents to his friends there, to keep up his interest at court. As for the king, he was so pleased with such a considerable augmentation of his revenue, that he continued him in his office two and twenty years, during which time he gained an immense treasure, under the reigns of three Ptolemies, namely Euergetes, Philopator, and Epiphanes the son of Philometor, who was dispossessed of those provinces by Antiochus the Great, as we have shewn in a former chapter<sup>2</sup>. After which Epiphanes having again recovered them by a marriage with Antiochus's daughter, he was again restored to his farms, and enjoyed them many years after, even, as our Jewish historian tells us, to the day of his death. The reader may see what we said on this head in the place above quoted†.

Joseph by this time had seven sons by one of his wives, and an eighth named *Hyrca*n by his brother Selinus's daughter, whom he had made him marry, instead of a beautiful Egyptian dancer. Joseph, whilst in Egypt, had seen this fair woman at some of the public shews, and was fallen in love with her; he was ashamed to discover his weakness to any but his brother, who promised to procure her to him; but, instead of her, he converted his own daughter into his bed; and when the cheat was discovered, Selinus did so well expostulate the matter with him, that he easily convinced him that he had acted a friendly part in preventing his exposing himself to the contempt of the Egyptians, by marrying such a public actress. Joseph, satisfied with his reasons, took his new wife home, and had this Hyrca by her, who proved such a promising youth, that he soon ingrossed his affection from all his other brethren, and the sequel will shew that he was really deserving of it<sup>h</sup>.

Ptolemy Philopator.
Simon II.
high-priest.
Year of the Flood 2778.
Before
Christ
221.

In the interim, Ptolemy, surnamed Philopator, succeeded his father Euergetes in Egypt, not without strong suspicion of his having dispatched him by poison, as he was indeed profligate enough for such a deed; and Simon II. had succeeded his father Onias soon after in the high-priesthood at Jerusalem. This pontiff was of a quite different spirit from his father; he was a man of great piety and zeal, of singular conduct and courage; all which were put to a severe proof before he had passed the first year of his pontificate. He was moreover free from that sordidness and avarice which had proved so detrimental to the Jewish state during his father's office; for, besides those dangers which his wife nephew had the address to avoid, they had suffered a constant series of evils from the Samaritans, ever since these last came to be aware of the baseness of the Jewish pontiff. Nothing less indeed could be expected from that exasperated nation, who watched all opportunities to vent their malice, than that they should take the advantage of their weak government to insidiate and oppress them. Accordingly, Josephus tells us, there was scarce a year in which they did not make some incursion, ravage the country, and carry away captives, during the whole time of that cowardly priest<sup>i</sup>. But to return to Philopator, we may remember he was like to have lost Palestine by the treachery of Theodore, governor of Phœnicia, who had rebelled against him, and engaged to put that province, together with those of Judæa and Cœle-Syria, into Antiochus's hands, who had always looked upon them as dismembered from his own kingdom. The plot having been timely discovered, Antiochus openly invaded Galilee, took a great many cities on both sides of Jordan, particularly Philoteria, on the north side of the sea of Tiberias, Bethshan or Scythopolis, on the south, and Itabyrium, strongly situated on mount Tabor. From thence he took all the land that had formerly belonged to the two tribes and half on the other side of Jordan; but winter drawing near, he left five thousand men there under the command of Hippolochus and Cheræas, two other revolvers from Ptolemy, to keep the country in awe till the next spring. By that time Ptolemy came with such a powerful army against him, that he defeated him in a set battle, and forced him out of those provinces; after which all the cities did readily open their gates to the conqueror, and sent their ambassadors to make their submission and presents to him <sup>k</sup>.

THE Jews, always attached to the Egyptians, were some Philopators the forwardest to come and congratulate him upon his late success. They were kindly received by him, and, among other marks of his favour, he told them, that he designed to go to Jerusalem, and offer his sacrifices to their God. He did so accordingly, and, besides a great number of victims which he there offered, he made some considerable presents to the temple; but this munificence gave them but a short-lived joy, which was soon after turned into the deepest mourning. The beauty of the temple, and the splendid order and decency of its worship, did unhappily raise in the king a curiosity of seeing the inside; and Simon II. who then officiated as high-priest, failed not to represent to him the sacredness of the place; the entrance of which was by their law forbid not only to strangers, but even to the Jews themselves, who were not of the sacerdotal order; he even ventured to denounce some heavy punishment from God, in case he presumed to profane his temple, whilst the priests were humbly surrounding him to obstruct his passage, and the people, in the utmost consternation, sending up their cries to heaven to avert his design. All this opposition made that obstinate monarch more resolute, and having forced his way through the outward courts, he was going on to enter into the holy place itself, when God smote him with such a dread and terror of mind, as put a full stop to his further progress. He was carried out half dead by his attendants, and as soon as he was come to himself, instead of adoring the powerful hand that had smitten him, he breathed out the most dreadful threats, not only against those who had dared to oppose his will, but against the whole nation. Soon after which he departed from Jerusalem, full of the deepest resentment, the sad effects of which he was not long before he made them feel, by one of the dreadfulest persecutions that that unhappy nation had ever suffered, but which was happily stopped by the singular interposition of providence. We have given an account of this wonderful change in a former chapter †; and all that we shall add here is, that as their constancy to their religion had obtained this miraculous deliverance, it drew as heavy a punishment on those who through fear had apostatised from it. Ptolemy, now more than ever convinced that the Jews were protected by a divine power, and that men, who could be thus faithful to their God, could never turn rebels to their prince (P); among other marks of his favour and high esteem, did at their earnest request grant them full power to inflict what punishment they thought fit on those few apostates, who were soon after put to death, to the number of three hundred, as a warning to future ages. The Jews thus happily delivered, erected a stately pillar, and instituted a festival in memory of it, which was observed during several centuries after. This remarkable history, however, has been omitted by Josephus; he says nothing of it in his antiquities, and as for what we find of it in his book against Apion, besides that it is only in the Latin version of Rufinus, and not in the original, it is there said to have happened under Ptolemy Physcon, so that the book, out of which this persecution and deliverance is taken, seems to have been unknown to the Jewish historian. We shall refer the reader to the margin for a further account of the book and its authority (Q).

Ptolemy

(P) They gave that prince soon after a noble instance of this, when he was forced to make war against his rebellious Egyptians, in which the Jews proved so faithful to him, that sixty thousand of them lost their lives in one battle (44).

(Q) It is improperly called the third book of the Maccabees; for it is prior to the other two in point of time, and to the second book in point of authority. As for the word Maccabæe, of which we shall have occasion to speak more fully in the sequel, it was used by the Jews to signify those brave heroes, who either stood up in defence of, or suffered for, their religion; and therefore that name is given to this book, as it contains the history of that persecution which the Jews suffered at Alexandria, and were like to have suffered in all the dominions of Philopator. Who the author of it was, is not there said; but he is supposed to have been an Alexandrian Jew, who has embellished his history, after the manner of his nation, with some enlargements, and couched them in a romantic style, not very likely to raise the credit of it, though the

Ptolemy Philopator died sometime after, and left the kingdom to his son, surnamed Epiphanes; who, being then but between four and five years old; gave a handle to his two competitors; Antiochus the Great and Philip of Macedon, to join their forces to divest the young monarch of his whole kingdom (R); the former was to invade the provinces Palestine

main purport of the story be nevertheless acknowledged to be true; for the Jews have undergone many such persecutions, and have been sometimes as wonderfully delivered.

The time in which this book was written, is thought to be after the other two of the Maccabees and that of the son of Sirac, called Ecclesiasticus (45). What is related in the beginning, concerning Theodotus and Arifnoe, seems taken out of Polybius, and therefore is supposed to have been written after this last (46); and yet both authors might have it from more antient records, so that no sure inference can be made about it.

It was written originally in Greek, and is quoted by some antient fathers (47) as canonical; but disputed by others, and was once received in the same apostolic canon with the other two; but the vulgate version has never admitted it, though the greatest part of the septuagint copies now extant have it, particularly our Alexandrian one; but this last not being in use in the western church at the time of the reformation, but the Latin only, that is the reason, why our English bibles have it not, though it may much better deserve a place in it, than some other apocryphal pieces that are in it.

There is still another book of the same name, commonly known by the name of the fourth book of Maccabees. We have often quoted it in the sequel of this chapter, though the author sometimes clashes with Josephus and other historians. Archbishop Ussher quotes likewise sometimes an Arabic version of it, which has been printed in Mr. Le Jay's polyglot; the book itself is very much unknown to the Latin fathers, and the Greek ones, by whom it is mentioned; differed much about its author. The reader may see all that is worth knowing concerning it in Calmet's preface to it, and we shall here own once for all, that it is to him we owe all the following quotations out of that book.

(R) The second year of this young monarch's reign being, according to the Jewish chronology, the three thousand five hundred and sixtieth year of the world, those authors tell us, that Josua the son of Berachiah was chosen Nassi or president, and Nathan the Abelite, Ab beth-din or vice president, of the sanhedrin and of the university school at Jerusalem. They add, that when Alexander, the leſtine and Phœnicia, and the latter Egypt, and each was to keep all he conquered. On this occaſion the Jews wonted loyalty failed them, ſo that they took part with Antiochus, who made a quick progreſs in that province, but was again as quickly deprived of it by Scopas the Egyptian general, who reduced the Jews to their former obedience. This advantage, however, proved but ſhort-lived, and the Syrian king ſoon recovered it all from him; and in this ſecond expedition the Jews did do him ſuch ſignal ſervices, that he reſolved to ſpare no favour to fix them to his intereſt; for when Scopas had only the citadel of Jeruſalem left, into which he had thrown a ſtrong garriſon, they received the Syrian troops and elephants into that city, and aſſiſted them with all their power, to drive the Egyptians out of it, which was ſoon accompliſhed by their united ſtrength (S).

Antiochus

Asmonean king of Judæa, put the Jewiſh doctors to death, for having dared to rebuke him for taking upon him the high-prieſthood, as well as the regal dignity, Joſhua fled into Egypt, and that Jeſus of Nazareth followed him thither, and became his diſciple (48).

One may ſee by this what wretched chronologers the Jews are, ſince that Jewiſh year of the world was many years before that Asmonean king, and above two hundred years before the birth of Chriſt (49).

(S) Our author doth not tell us the reaſon of this defection; but it is likely, that Epiphanes's minority had encouraged his governors in thoſe provinces, to load them with heavy taxes, and ſuch like oppreſſions, eſpecially Scopas, who was of ſuch a rapacious temper, that he ſtuck at no rapine or cruelty to enrich himſelf.

On the other hand, Antiochus had ſhewed himſelf a great friend to the Jews, that were in the provinces of Babylon and Meſopotamia, and had granted them ſuch great privileges, as might eaſily induce thoſe of Judæa to prefer his government to that of the Egyptians, by which they were now ſo much oppreſſed. Joſephus tells us further, that the Babylonish Jews had ſhewed ſuch an attachment to that prince, and done him ſuch ſignal ſervices, that he confiſted the guard of his ſtrongeſt and moſt conſiderable garriſons to them, and ſent them into ſeveral provinces to quell his other ſeditious ſubjects. All which, being ſo many arguments of the great truſt he put in them, could not but be highly pleaſing to thoſe of Paleſtine.

(48) Abr. Zaccut. in Juchasin. David Gantz, in Zemakh. Dav. Shalſbel Haccabal. (49) Vid. Prid. ubi ſupra, an. 202. Scallig. de emen. temp. Uſſer. & al.

Antiochus therefore, willing to gratify the Jewish nation for their so freely engaging in his interest against the Egyptians, sent a letter to Ptolemy, his then general, which has been preserved at length by Josephus<sup>1</sup>, and in which, having related the great services which that people had done him, he acquaints him, that he designed to restore their metropolis to its antient splendor, liberty, and privileges, and to recal all those Jews who had been driven out of it: that, out of his singular respect to the temple of their God, he granted unto them twenty thousand pieces of silver, towards the charges of victims, frankincense, wine, and oil; one thousand four hundred measures of fine wheat, and three hundred seventy five measures of salt, towards their usual oblations: that the temple should be thoroughly repaired at his own cost: that they should enjoy the free exercise of their religion, restore the public service of the temple, and the priests, levites, singers, &c. to their usual functions: that no stranger, or Jew that was unpurified, should enter within the sept (T) of that sacred place: and that no flesh of unclean beasts should be brought into Jerusalem, not even their skins; all these under the penalty of paying three thousand pieces of silver into the treasury of the temple. He further granted an exemption from all taxes for three years to all the dispersed Jews that should come within a limited time to repeople that metropolis: and that all that had been sold for slaves, within his dominion, should be immediately set free. By all these extraordinary favours, Antiochus did so fasten the Jews to his interest, that not only Judæa, but all the other neighbouring provinces readily submitted to him, and that monarch, having in the space of one campaign, subdued and quieted them, returned to his capital, and passed the winter there.

But, whatever was the cause of this change, the same author tells us, that Antiochus no sooner came with his army, than they cheerfully surrendered themselves to him; and that, on his appearing before Jerusalem, the priests and elders went out in a solemn manner to meet him, and make their submission to him; they then received him into their city, and entertained both him and his army, his horses and elephants, and furnished him with arms and other necessaries for the war (50)

(T) This inclosure, which the Hebrews called Chel, was that which separated the circumcised from the uncircumcised, within which therefore it was unlawful for the latter to enter (51).

 a former volume*; but we have there shewn the impossibility of his being the person, and that it could be no other than Onias the first of that name. In the eighth year of Onias III. the Jews lost their great friend and protector Antiochus, who was murdered by the people of Elymais, as has been related in a former volume†. They found as kind a one in his son Seleucus for some time. The Jews were then in such high esteem, that sovereign princes courted their friendship, and made magnificent presents to the temple; and Seleucus furnished out of his own treasury all the expences of it. Judæa enjoyed a profound peace, and their laws were observed with great strictness under their worthy high-priest<sup>n</sup>, until a misunderstanding, which happened between him and Simon a Benjamite, brought a series of evils on the Jewish state.

Onias had then enjoyed the sacerdotal dignity about sixteen years; and Simon had been made governor of the temple<sup>o</sup>. Perhaps that place was devolved to him from Joseph, the generous son of Tobias lately mentioned, whose son he is supposed to have been; when an uproar happening in the city, caused this fatal breach betwixt those two great persons in the eleventh year of Seleucus. The author doth not tell us upon what account this tumult was raised. We shall give the best conjecture we can about it in the margin (V), it being

(V) We have lately taken notice of Joseph's progeny, and, among others, of his worthy son Hyrcau. The father being, before this time, grown so old, that he could not go down to congratulate the Egyptian king in person on the birth of his son, offered that office to all his other seven sons; none of whom being willing to accept it, Hyrcau undertook the journey, having first obtained a letter of credit from his father on his Alexandrian agent, for what sums he should want to defray the charges of his commission.

ing a sequel of the history of Joseph and his son Hyrcau, and in no case foreign to that of the Jews we are upon. This contest, whatever it was, grew to such a height, that Si-

It being then the usual custom to make those monarchs some considerable presents upon such occasions, Hyrcau having drawn one thousand talents from his father's banker, bought one hundred beautiful youths for the king, and the same number of the fairest damsels for the queen, which were presented to them, with the addition of a talent which each of them brought in their hands; so that this single article amounted to four hundred talents. The rest he either bestowed in presents to the great ones of the court, or spent it in making a suitable figure during his abode there; so that the whole expence of this expedition amounted to two hundred thousand pounds sterling; whereas his father supposed that the one hundredth part of that sum would have defrayed the whole expence.

If Hyrcau therefore, by this uncommon munificence, secured to himself the favour of the Egyptian court, it did no less expose him to the anger and resentment of his old father and brethren; inasmuch that the latter way-laid him in his return, with a design to murder him; but Hyrcau, who had obtained the reversion of his father's farms, had provided himself with such a strong escort, that two of his brethren were killed on the spot, and the rest put to flight.

This increased still their enmity, especially when, after his father's death, he went to levy the yearly tribute in his stead; and this raised him so many enemies, that he was forced to retire over Jordan, where he built himself a strong and stately palace, which he called Tyre, whence he continued to make inroads and depredations on the neighbouring Arabs (52).

During this time it is probable he had regained the high-priest's favour, by sending into the treasury of the temple two hundred talents of gold, and four hundred talents of silver (53), which Simon, the supposed eldest son of Joseph, seems to have challenged as his own, during Hyrcau's abode on the other side of Jordan; but the strenuous Onias refusing to deliver it up, because consecrated to the maintenance of widows and orphans (as he himself confessed to Apollonius) this refusal might, in all probability, so exasperate the angry Benjamite, that he chose to have the whole treasure of that sacred place betrayed to that governor, rather than Hyrcau or Onias should reap the benefit of what the former had intrusted with the latter.

As for Hyrcau, he found himself soon after in such danger of being called to a severe account for his depredations by Antiochus Epiphanes, who had succeeded Seleucus Philopator, that, to avoid the worst, he ran himself upon his own sword (54).

mon, finding he could not get the better of the strenuous pontiff, went away to Apollonius the son of Thraseas, who was then governor of Cæle-Syria and Palestine, the only two provinces the Romans had left untaken from Seleucus<sup>P</sup>, and acquainted him, that there were immense treasures laid up in the temple of Jerusalem, which might, at his pleasure, be seized upon for the king's use. The governor sent to inform Seleucus (W) of it, who dispatched immediately Heliodorus to fetch it away to Antioch.

(W) It is plain from this whole story, which is taken from the second book of the Maccabees (55), and confirmed by Josephus (56), that Seleucus had enjoyed Palestine, Cæle-Syria, and Phœnicia, some time before his death; and how his father got these provinces from the king of Egypt, we have already seen; but how they reverted to that monarch, after they had been restored to Ptolemy upon his marriage with Cleopatra, we can no-where find.

It is true, Polybius seems to intimate, that this restitution was never made to Ptolemy (57); but that both Antiochus and his son still kept those provinces in their hands after the marriage; and elsewhere he introduces Antiochus Epiphanes denying that his grandfather had ever promised to surrender them to Ptolemy the king of Egypt (58). Hence some have concluded, that they had never returned to the latter, but had been constantly kept by the three former.

But all this seems clearly contradicted by what Josephus affirms of Hyrcaus's being sent to Egypt, to congratulate Ptolemy on the birth of a son by his queen Cleopatra. Shall we then say, that Joseph sent this compliment to him, not as to his king, but as to his quondam benefactor? But our Jewish historian adds, that all the nobility of Cæle-Syria flocked thither on the same errand; which plainly intimates, that he was in possession of those provinces.

We must therefore suppose, either that these compliments were paid to Ptolemy by the Jews and Cæle-Syrians, as to the son-in-law of Antiochus, to whom those provinces were shortly to devolve in virtue of the marriage; or else, that if they had been really surrendered to him, Seleucus took afterwards the advantage of his son Philopator's minority to divest him of them; since it is plain by the history of Simon's applying to Apollonius, of Seleucus sending Heliodorus, and of Onias applying himself, not to Ptolemy, but to Seleucus, for redress, that this last had possessed them some time before his death.

Heliodorus,

Heliodorus, the better to conceal the purport of his commission, pretended that he was ordered to go and view all the cities of Cæle-Syria and Phœnicia, and only to take Jerusalem in his way; but when he came thither, where he was received by the Jews with singular honours, he acquainted Onias with the orders he had received from the king, and made a more particular enquiry after those treasures. The high-priest told him, that there was indeed such a treasure in the temple, though nothing so large as he had been informed; that besides those things that had been consecrated to God, the rest had been deposited there by, or for the widows and orphans for their security, whose property therefore they were; that a considerable sum had been likewise laid up there by *Hyrca*n the son of Joseph, a man of great dignity; and that he, being the guardian of this wealth, could never give his consent that it should be alienated from the right owners, to the disgrace of his dignity and of that sacred place, which was revered by all the world: but all this not being sufficient to outweigh the positive orders which Heliodorus had received from the king, he marched directly towards the temple. The high-priest and the rest of the ministers of the place did in vain endeavour to obstruct his passage. Whilst the whole city was in the utmost confusion, the gates of the place were ordered to be broken down, and the Syrians were just going to enter, when God smote them with such a panic dread, that they fell down half dead. Heliodorus among the rest, who saw a vision of a man on horseback sumptuously dressed, who flew upon him with the utmost speed and fury, and crushed him under his horse's feet, was forthwith carried out almost dead by his men, and continued some days in that condition. At length Onias, fearing lest this wonderful accident should bring the Jews under the suspicion of having made some unlawful attempt against the Syrian minister, went to the temple, and offered some sacrifices for his recovery; which being obtained, he immediately left Jerusalem, and went to acquaint the king of what had happened to him. Seleucus, however, whether he suspected the truth of his relation, or was resolved at any price to get the Jewish treasure, asked him further, whether he knew any man that was fit to be sent upon that expedition? Heliodorus answered, that if the king had any enemy that he would be glad to get rid of, he need but send him to rifle that sacred place, and he would see him come back in such a condition, as would convince him, that it was under the protection of some divine and irresistible power<sup>q</sup>.

WHEN Simon found that he had missed his aim, he endeavoured to throw all the blame upon the good high-priest, pretending that he was the person who had called Heliodorus to Jerusalem; and drew such a party against him, that several persons were killed on both sides. At length Onias, fearing the consequences of such an intestine faction, especially seeing his rival in high favour with Apollonius the then governor, went to complain to the king at Antioch. He was well received, and Simon was thereupon banished<sup>r</sup>; but Seleucus, dying soon after, was succeeded by his son Antiochus, surnamed Epiphanes, whose brutish character we have seen in a former volume*, and who soon made his subjects repent of the joy they had expressed at his first coming to the crown. The Jews, of all others, were not long before they felt the dreadful effects of his fury, more through the ambition of some, and the factions and feuds which reigned then in that unhappy state, than the cruel temper of this new monarch.

Onias.*

HE was scarce settled on his throne before Jason (X), the brother of Onias the then high-priest, taking advantage of the king's penury, his treasury having been quite exhausted by the large tribute his predecessors had paid to the Romans; went to Antioch, and procured from him the high-priesthood at the price of three hundred and fifty talents, and obtained an order that his brother should be sent to, and confined to dwell at, that metropolis. Without this last, there would indeed have been little likelihood of his enjoying his ill-gotten dignity with any satisfaction, since the very presence of the deposed pontiff, so highly admired for his singular piety, must of course have revived the resentment and hatred of the people against him, and have proved a constant check to his authority<sup>s</sup>. Jason finding how welcome this money was to the young monarch, and being desirous to lessen, as much as possible,

(X) This wretch was called Jesus; but as he was going to purchase the favour [of the king and court, at the expence of every thing that ought to have been valuable to an honest Jew, he began with changing his name into that of Jason, which he thought more conformable and pleasing to the Greeks, whose customs he was then going to introduce into his nation.

the antipathy which other nations had against that of the Jews, offered him another sum of one hundred and fifty talents, for the liberty of erecting at Jerusalem a gymnasium or place of public exercises, such as were practised in Greece; an academy for training up the youth after the Grecian manner; and for the liberty of making such Jews as he thought fit, free of the city of Antioch; all which was readily granted to him. He then set out for Jerusalem, and with these powers formed so strong a party in Judæa, as he thought would easily overbear that of his rival Onias, which was still very strong, especially in Jerusalem. Among those that joined themselves to this intruder, were the malecontent sons of Joseph lately mentioned, and a number of others, who, through a wanton inconstancy, were become excessively fond of the Grecian customs, and as weary of their own<sup>c</sup>. The freedom of the city of Antioch, a very valuable privilege, was another bait, which drew still greater numbers over to him. From this time a general apostacy from the Jewish religion overspread the greatest part of the nation; the academies were erected by the usurping high-priest both for their youth and for men grown; and as some of these exercises were to be performed naked, these vile apostates found means to efface the scar of circumcision, to prevent their being distinguished from other nations. The priests, as well as the people, from thenceforward neglected the service of the temple, to assist at these new heathenish exercises; and the laws, which the Jewish nation had obtained for the free exercise of their religion and rights, became of none effect, through the baseness of one single renegado, who sacrificed his religion and country to his ungovernable ambition.

As he stuck at nothing that could ingratiate himself to Antiochus, he sent the next year a number of his partisans, on whom he had bestowed the freedom of Antioch, to assist at the olympic games, with a considerable sum to (Y) be spent in

(Y) This sum, the common Greek copies say, was only three hundred drachms; but as the learned Usher observes (59), this was too inconsiderable a sum upon such an occasion, it amounting to but a little above eleven pounds sterling; and therefore prefers the

in sacrifices to the Tyrian Hercules, in whose honour those games were celebrated * ; but these men, whether out of conscience or fear, chose rather to make a present of it to the Tyrians towards the repairing of their fleet. Antiochus, by this time understanding that the young king of Egypt, now of age, designed to attempt the recovery of Palestine, Phœnice, and Cœle-Syria, made a tour into these provinces, and took Jerusalem in his way, where Jason received him with a magnificence suitable to the value he put upon that monarch's favour and friendship.

He did not, however, enjoy his ill-gotten dignity long, before he was thrust out of it by his own brother Menelaus (Z), whom he had sent to Antiochus with the usual tribute. Menelaus, instead of consulting the king about those matters which his brother had charged him with, took that opportunity to insinuate himself to him by the most flagrant flatteries ; to which having added the sum of three hundred talents more than Jason had paid for the high-priesthood, he easily obtained it, and returned with his new commission to Jerusalem in the third year of Jason's pontificate. He soon got himself a strong party, at the head of which were the sons of Tobias, who were then very powerful in Judæa ; but Jason was not without his powerful friends, who, detesting Menelaus's

(Z) This apostate's right name was Onias, which he changed for that of Menelaus, in imitation of his brother, and in complaisance to the Greeks. The book of the Maccabees (60) makes him the son of Tobias, and brother of Simon abovementioned ; but if he had been of that family, he could not have entered into the sacerdotal office, without such a manifest violation of the Mosaic law, as would have set the whole Jewish nation against him ; for tho' they proved but too complying to the Grecian customs lately introduced, yet they seem to have had an invincible attachment to the Aaronic family.

Josephus therefore is most generally followed, who expressly tells us (61), that he was the brother of the deposed Onias and of Jason ; and that he did but requite the latter for having supplanted the former, in which case the high priesthood was still retained in the right line.

treachery,

treachery, soon forced him to retire, with the heads of his faction, into Antioch. Hither, the better to gain their point against Jason, they went, and acquainted Antiochus, that they were fully resolved to forsake their old religion, and wholly to conform to that of his country; which so pleased that proud monarch, that he sent them back with a force sufficient to drive Jason out of Judæa into the land of the Ammonites. Being thus rid of his rival and seated in his new dignity, his next care was to perform his promise to the king, and to outdo his brother in his apostacy<sup>u</sup>.

BUT whilst he was endeavouring, by all wicked means, to ingratiate himself to Antiochus and to his court, he neglected one main article, the paying of the money he had promised to him, tho' Sostratus, then governor of the citadel of Jerusalem and receiver of the king's customs in Palestine, was continually pressing him to it. At length Antiochus, suspecting some private intelligence between them, ordered them both to come to Antioch, Menelaus leaving his brother Lyfimachus his vicegerent at Jerusalem. At their arrival at Antioch, they found that the king had been forced to go and quell a sedition in Cilicia †, and had left the government of Antioch to Andronicus, one of the prime nobles of his court. Menelaus having exhausted his coffers, and finding that nothing but the payment of the king's money could recover his favour, sent private instructions to his brother at Jerusalem, to convey to him as many of the golden vessels as he could conveniently strip the temple of; which having received soon after, and caused to be sold at Tyre and in the neighbouring cities, raised him a sufficient sum, not only to satisfy the king, but also to bribe his courtiers in his favour. All this, however, could not be transacted so secretly, but his brother Onias, who had been, ever since his deposition, confined to that capital, had intelligence of his sacrilege. He made such bitter complaints against Menelaus, as were like to have raised all the Antiochian Jews against him. He was therefore obliged to have recourse to Andronicus, whom he had already bribed by his presents; and for a fresh sum of money engaged him to cut off the good old high-priest, who, being by this time apprized of his intrigues, had taken sanctuary at Daphne, an asylum near the city of Antioch. Andronicus went to him, and, under some pretence or other, accompanied with the most solemn vows

THIS treacherous murder of a person so venerable for his age and exemplary piety, and so respected in that metropolis, both by Jews and Gentiles, drew the bitterest complaints against the sacrilegious assassin, as soon as the king was returned to Antioch; and that prince, bad as he was, could not forbear shedding of tears at the news of it. As soon therefore as he had taken full cognizance of the fact, he caused the murderer to be stripped of his purple, and to be conducted with infamy to the place where it had been committed, and there to be put to death. As for Menelaus, though the most guilty of the two, he found means to avoid the present storm, and to maintain his credit some time longer; but this obliged him to draw such large sums from Jerusalem, that Lyfimachus was forced to raise them by the most unheard-of violences and sacrileges, which ended in an universal mutiny, in which the Jews fell upon him and the three thousand men he had got to defend him, with such desperate fury, that they killed a great number of them, and put the rest to flight. Lyfimachus, no longer able to resist, was pursued to the treasury of the temple, and there massacred by the enraged multitude. Antiochus coming soon after to Tyre, the Jewish sanhedrin resolved to send a deputation to him, both to justify the putting to death Lyfimachus, and to accuse Menelaus, as the author and cause of all the troubles that had happened both in Judæa and Antioch. The three deputies pleaded their cause so well before the king, that Menelaus, not knowing which way to clear himself and avoid the impending punishment, had recourse to his old secret of bribery. He applied

(A) This worthy person, whose character is excellently well drawn by the author of the second book of Maccabees (12), is supposed to have been murdered in the twenty-fourth year of his pontificate.

There is indeed some difference between Josephus, and Eusebius, and the Alexandrian chronicle, concerning the length of time between his accession to that dignity and his being murdered at Antioch; but as the last quoted author assigns expressly twenty four years to it, he has been preferred before the other two. The reader may see the reasons for it in our learned Prideaux (13).

himself to a favourite of Antiochus, named Ptolemy Macron, the son of Dorymenes, and promised him so large a sum, that that courtier, who knew the inconstancy of that monarch's temper, easily prevailed upon him, not only to absolve the apostate high-priest, but also to condemn the three Jewish deputies to death. This sentence, unjust as it was, was forthwith put in execution, and those venerable men were hurried to death, who, as the author of the Maccabees expresses it, would have gained their cause, had they pleaded it before even the Scythians; and indeed this piece of cruelty and injustice was so shocking to the Tyrians, that though they dared not openly exclaim against it, yet they ventured to shew their respect to those deputies, by bestowing an honourable burial upon them *.

THIS unjust sentence gave the traitor Menelaus such a compleat victory over all his opposers, that from thenceforth he gave himself up to all manner of tyranny and wickedness; Jerusalem became destitute of protectors; the sanhedrin, if there were any zealous men left among them, were so terrified by this last cruelty on their deputies, that they no longer dared to oppose him, though they saw that every step he took was with design to enslave the nation still more, and to overturn the small remains of their religion and liberties. These were the sad prognostics of those evils which soon after overtook that rebellious nation, and in which God chose to punish them for their apostacy, by means of that very monarch, whose favour they had bought at the expence of their religion and laws; and to convince them that these grievous calamities were the effects of his anger, they were pre-signified to them by the most terrifying apparitions in the air for the space of forty days, during which there were seen multitudes of armed men, both foot and horse, magnificently armed and apparelled, charging and fighting against each other in battle-array, whilst their ears were dinned with the clashing of swords, lances, and shields; all which dreadful omens threw the whole city into the deepest consternation, whilst they all looked upon them as the sure forerunners of some sad calamity, which they in vain endeavour'd, when it was too late, to avert by their prayers from that unhappy land †.

THIS fatal change was occasioned by an accident, which seemed at first of no great consequence, but proved in a little time the cause of all their miseries. Antiochus was then taken up with the conquest of Egypt, when a false rumour was by some means spread, that he had been killed before Alexan- dria. Jason, who had been forced to retire into the land of Ammon after his deposition, heard of it, and thought it was a fit opportunity to attempt the recovery of his dignity, and that his nation, tired with the Syrian government, and especially with the tyranny of Menelaus, would readily receive him again with open arms. To this end he got him a band of about one thousand resolute men, at the head of whom he quickly appeared before the walls of Jerusalem, which, by the help of a party which he had within that metropolis, he easily entered, and forced his brother to retire into the citadel; after which, minding nothing but his resentment, he committed the most horrid butcheries against such of the Jews as he suspected to have been of the contrary party. He was, however, soon after forced to leave both the city and country, at the news of Antiochus coming with a powerful army against him (B); for that prince, highly provoked at this rebellion, and especially at the news, that the Jewish nation had made some rejoicings at the report of his death, was actually coming with a great army against Jerusalem. The Jews apprised of his will towards them, seem to have made a stout resistance, and to have given him no small trouble in forcing his way into their metropolis (C); but the gates being at length forced open to him, perhaps by some of his friends from within, he spared no cruelty

His cruelty

(B) Our historian says, that he retired at first to the Ammonitish king, where becoming soon after suspected by that prince, he was forced to withdraw, and to wander from city to city, being detested by all that knew him, as a betrayer of his country, and a monster of mankind (14).

He came at length into Egypt, and finding no safety there, he hoped he might at least find it among the Lacedæmonians, in virtue of the pretended kindred between their nation and his own; but here he also missed of his aim, at least it seems as if he had not met with any favourable reception, since our author adds, that, at his death, his carcass was left to rot above ground, being denied even the common sepulchre that was allowed to other strangers (15).

(C) So says the book of the Maccabees (16), with whom agrees Diodorus Siculus (17), and even Josephus, in his wars of the Jews (18), where he expressly says, that he laid siege to that city, and represents him as enraged at the trouble it gave him; but in his

ty against its unhappy inhabitants, insomuch, that within three days they reckoned no less than forty thousand killed, and as many taken captives, and sold for slaves to the neighbouring nations <sup>2</sup>.

HIS fury did not stop here ; he caused the traitor Menelaus, who, by this time, had by some means recovered his good graces, to lead him to the temple, which he entered, even to its most sacred recesses (D), laying his impious hands on all the vessels that were in it, and caused the golden altar of incense, the golden table of the shew-bread, the golden candlestick, the censers, bowls, and other utensils belonging to that holy place to be seized, together with the golden shields, crowns, and other ornaments which had been dedicated to it. He caused also the gold plating that covered the gates and other architecture of the temple, the veil that divided the holy antiquities he tells us, that he entered it without force ; and that those of his party within did open the gates to him (19). The former is indeed the most probable, and Josephus might easily forget himself through the distance of time in which he wrote those two books ; and this may in some measure atone for such-like inconsistencies which are to be met with in him.

(D) D. Siculus, in the place last quoted out of him, tells, upon some Heathenish report, that Antiochus being entered into the most sacred part of the temple, where the high-priest alone was to be admitted, he there found the statue of a man carved in stone, with a long beard, holding a book in his hand, and mounted upon an ass ; and supposing it to have been the statue of Moses, the Jewish law-giver and founder of Jerusalem, he took it into his head to destroy the mutual hatred between the Jews and the rest of the world, by destroying of their law.

To this end he caused a large sow to be sacrificed on the altar of burnt-offerings to that law-giver, sprinkled the porch and the sacred books with the blood of it, caused the high-priest and others to eat of the flesh, and put out the lamp which burnt night and day in the temple. All which Josephus has sufficiently confuted (20), from Polybius, N. Damascen, and other authors better acquainted with the Jewish religion than this Sicilian. Only he adds, that Antiochus, not contented with rifling the temple of all its riches, caused it to be polluted, by sacrificing some swine upon its altar, and sprinkling the broth of them upon the Jews (21 ; but this circumstance, if true, has been omitted by the authors of the two books of the Maccabees.

from the most holy place, and, in a word, all that was valuable, either for its metal or workmanship, to be carried off, besides one thousand eight hundred talents of gold and silver, which he forced out of the treasury. Having thus glutted his revenge and avarice, he returned in such a kind of triumph to Antioch, as if he had had it now in his power, to use our author's words, to make the land navigable, and the sea passable on foot <sup>a</sup>. As a further mark of his spleen against that unhappy nation, he put it under the government of one Philip, a most barbarous Phrygian, and Samaria under that of Andronicus, a person of the same brutish disposition, and left the apostate Menelaus, the most hateful of all the three, in possession of the high-priesthood <sup>b</sup>.

WHAT the Jewish nation suffered under those governors, or rather butchers, is more easily imagined than described; but their miseries were not to end there. Some time after Antiochus having received the mortifying letter from the Roman senate we have elsewhere taken notice of †, he chose them above all other people to wreck his resentment against, and with as much cruelty as if they had been the cause of his disgrace. To this end he dispatched from his army, as he was marching through Judæa, Apollonius, at the head of twenty two thousand men, with orders to plunder all the cities of Judæa, to murder all the men, and to save only the women and children for sale. Apollonius came accordingly with his army (E), and, to outward appearance, with a peaceable intention, which was not suspected by the Jews, because he was superintendant of the tribute in Palestine. He kept himself quiet till the next sabbath, when they were all in a profound quiet, when on a sudden he commanded his men to arms, some of whom he sent to cut all in pieces that were gone to the temple and to the other synagogues; whilst the rest, going through the streets of the city, massacred all that came in their way, which they did without the least resistance from those unhappy wretches, who suffered themselves to be butchered in that merciless manner, rather than break their sabbath by standing on their defence. He next ordered the city to be plundered, and then set it on fire, pulled down all their stately fabrics, caused the walls to be demolished, and carried away captive about ten thousand of those that had been saved from the slaughter <sup>c</sup>. From that time the service of the temple was quite abandoned, that place having been every-where polluted, both with the blood of the slain, and with many other defilements. From the ruins of the city the officers of Antiochus built a large fortress on an eminence in the city of David *, fortified it with a strong wall, stately towers, and placed a garison in it to command the temple, over-against which it was built; so that the soldiers could easily see and sally upon all those that ventured to come to that sacred place, so many of whom were continually plundered and murdered by them, that the rest, not daring to stay longer in Jerusalem, went and dwelt in the neighbouring cities of the Gentiles. In this polluted and forsaken condition did this metropolis and its temple continue three full years and a half; that is, till Judas Maccabeus, having wrested both out of their hands, did purify and restore them to their antient splendor and use, as we shall see in due time <sup>d</sup> (F).

(E) Josephus seems to have confounded this slaughter with that which was made by Antiochus two years before, by making him present at this also (22); but it appears from the author of the Maccabees, who rightly distinguishes these two persecutions, that the one was executed in the presence of that monarch, and the other by his vicegerent Apollonius.

THE Jews of Palestine were not the only ones who felt the fury of this persecution. Antiochus, resolved either totally to abolish their religion, or to destroy their whole race, as far at least as he could reach them, caused a decree to be issued out the following year, that all nations within his dominions should forsake their old religion and gods, and worship those of the king, under the severest penalties. To make

Who this author was, is neither agreed nor easily guessed. Some make him of the sacerdotal line, as descended from Josbua the son of Josedech (26). Some Greek copies give him for grandfather Eleasar the father of Sirac of Jerusalem; but we find nothing like this pretended priesthood or descent in those places of the book where he speaks more particularly of himself (27). Only it appears, that his great thirst after wisdom (28) made him pray fervently, study hard, travel much, and undergo many great dangers for it (29); that he had been unjustly traduced to the king (30); whence he is supposed to have retired into Egypt, and there composed his book. Lastly he tells us, that he was the last writer of the Jewish nation who treated of moral subjects (31). This is all that we know of the author.

As to the work, which was antiently called Πανάρετος, that is, according to the Greek energy, the store or treasure of all virtues, we shall have occasion to speak of it, when we come to the time of its being translated into Greek. Some antients, particularly St. Austin (32), thought once the same person the author of the book of Wisdom, as well as of this of Ecclesiasticus, but he owns his mistake in another place. And as to the latter of these, it is not known who wrote it, only it is generally believed, that it was never wrote originally in Hebrew, because there are none of those Hebraisms in it, which are every-where found in other versions out of that language; and there are in it many Greek ones, which convince one, that it was originally written in that language. This might be sufficient to confute those who pretend it to have been originally written in Hebrew and by king Solomon (33); but, besides this, we may urge against them the unlikenels of style with his other writings; its never being mentioned by Jewish authors; its being rejected out of their canon, and many more too obvious to be mentioned.

his orders more effectual, he sent overseers into every province to see them strictly put in execution ; and as the Jews were the only people who he knew would disobey them, so especial directions were given to have them treated with the utmost severity. Many therefore of them, either to avoid the effects of his rage, or to ingratiate themselves to him, did not only comply with great readiness, but, having once apostatised, became the bitterest enemies of those who had the courage to refuse ; all which did but increase the already too general defection, as it did on the other hand the sufferings of those who stood firm to their religion<sup>e</sup>. As for the Samaritans, a much less danger would have cooled all their zeal, either for the Jewish nation, or the Mosaic law. To convince the king therefore, that they did not design to die martyrs to either, they sent a deputation to him, setting forth, that tho' they had hitherto conformed in many of the Jewish superstitions, in imitation of their fore-fathers who had been persuaded to it for their own safety, yet they were now ready to forsake them all, and to embrace the king's religion. They added, that they had a temple on mount Garizim, which was dedicated to a God without a name (G) ; but begged it might thenceforth be dedicated to the Grecian Jupiter, as Josephus has it, or rather, as the author of the Maccabees calls him<sup>f</sup>, the hospitaller, or, the receiver or protector of strangers, intimating thereby, that they were not originally natives of that country, but strangers settled there in times past. They concluded with a petition, that as they were not of Jewish, but Sidonian, race, and were ready to conform in every thing to the king's will, they might not be involved in the same calamities with their wicked rivals.

(G) We have, in a former volume †, acquainted our readers, that the Jews, after their return from the Babylonish captivity, had left off pronouncing the name Jehovah, and substituted that of Adonai to it, where-ever it occurred in their reading of the sacred books. As therefore the temple was simply called the house or temple of God, and oftner emphatically the house or temple, without adding any proper name, the Samaritans made this a pretence for calling theirs the temple of a nameless deity, as the superstitious Jews called that name of God, Ανεκφώνητον, unutterable, or unlawful to be uttered.

Antiochus readily granted them their request, and dispatched a letter to Nicanor his sub-governor there, with orders, that they should be distinguished from the Jews, and that their temple should be dedicated according to their petition; all which was punctually observed.

A cruel persecution in Judæa. WHILST the Samaritans peacefully enjoyed the fruits of their treacherous complaisance, Atheneas, an old minister, well versed in all the Heathenish rites, as well as in cruelty, made those of Judæa undergo the most severe punishments for their steadfastness to their religion. He began with dedicating the temple to Jupiter Olympius, and causing his statue to be erected on the altar of burnt-offerings (H), with another

(H) This idol was set up in the temple on the fifteenth of the month Cisleu, which answers to part of our November and December; but they did not begin to offer sacrifices to it till the twenty fifth of that month, which was the king's birth-day; so that from thenceforth they continued sacrificing to it every twenty fifth day of the month, till the Jewish religion and state were restored by Judas Maccabeus.

The profanation of the temple, and the setting up this idol in it, had been long before foretold by the prophet Daniel (34, under the name of abomination of desolation; but there are in that chapter many other strokes, which do plainly delineate this persecution, and the tyrant that caused it. We shall content ourselves with subjoining some of the plainest of them.

This expedition begins at the 29th verse of that chapter thus: He shall return at the time appointed, and come towards the south (Egypt); but it shall not be as the former or as the latter. for the ships of Chittim (the Romans) shall come against him; therefore he shall be grieved, and return with indignation, or turn his indignation against the holy covenant (the Jewish religion). Thus shall he do, he shall get intelligence of those that forsake the covenant. Some shall stand on his side, and he shall pollute the sanctuary of strength, and shall cast away the daily sacrifice, and they shall place the abomination (or abominable thing) that maketh desolate; and such as do wickedly against the covenant, shall be corrupt by flatteries. But the people that know their God shall behave valiantly, and such as have understanding, and instruct the people, (divert them from apostatising) shall fall by the sword, by flame, by captivity, by spoil. — And the king shall do according to his will, and shall exalt and magnify himself above every god. He shall speak wonderful things against the God of gods, and shall prosper till the indignation be accomplished; for that which is determined shall be done, &c. The same prophet points him out thereby as scattering the prey, spoil, and riches among his followers.

another lesser altar before it, whereon they sacrificed to that false deity. All those therefore that refused to come and worship it, were either massacred out of hand, or put to some more lingering torments, till they either complied, or died under the hand of their butchers. At the same time there were altars, groves, and statues set up in every city and town of Judæa, to which the inhabitants were compelled to come and sacrifice, under the same severe penalties; insomuch, that the whole land was but a scene, either of the most abominable idolatries and debaucheries, or of the most horrid butcheries; and when the feast of Bacchus was come, they were either forced to assist at it, and to go about the streets with their heads crowned with ivy, in honour of that beastly deity, or exposed themselves to some cruel death. All this while it was made immediate death to be caught observing either the sabbath, the rite of circumcision, or any other branch of the Mosaic law; insomuch, that two women having been found to have circumcised the children of which they had been lately delivered, were both led, with the infants hung about their necks, through several streets of Jerusalem, and cast headlong down from the highest walls of the city, and all that had assisted at the ceremony were put to death<sup>8</sup>.

THESE unheard-of barbarities having obliged many of the Jews to leave their habitations, and to go and hide themselves among the cragged rocks in holes and caverns, and to live upon wild roots and herbs, to avoid either death or apostacy, some of them ventured to assemble themselves in a cavern near Jerusalem, to celebrate the sabbath. But Philip, their barbarous Phrygian governor, having been informed of it, came against them with a sufficient force; and after having, in vain, offered them a general amnesty, if they would forsake their religion, and conform to that of the king, he and it is well known, that his extravagant largesses had not only emptied his coffers, but gained him the title of magnanimous and munificent.

The reader may remember, that whilst Antiochus was preparing himself for the conquest of Egypt, the Romans sent their deputies to him, who obliged him to set aside that enterprize; for which he vented his resentment on the innocent Jews in the manner we have related, and exactly as it had been foretold in the prophecy before us; so that it is impossible not to know that he was the person designed by providence to be the scourge of his people.

waited without any other hostilities, till the next sabbath ; on which day, entering the cave without resistance, he caused them all, men, women, and children, to be massacred, to the number of a thousand <sup>d</sup>. As to the sacred Jewish books, Philip and his officers had taken care to burn and destroy all that they could lay hands on, whether in the temple, in their synagogues, or even in their private houses ; after which, if any Jew was found to conceal any of them, he was dragged to immediate death <sup>i</sup>. They had several other ways of trying those who retained still a due regard to the law of Moses ; and in order to make as many as they could comply with the king's command, they spared neither flatteries nor caresses to encourage, nor threats and tortures to deter them ; so that, though vast numbers were seduced by these means, yet there were still a sufficient number, especially in and about Jerusalem, who continued proof against them, to vex the tyrant for not being universally obeyed.

martyred.

As soon, therefore, as he heard, that there were such numbers who remained still inflexible, he resolved to come in person to Jerusalem, and to see either his orders more punctually obeyed, or the recusants punished with the most exquisite cruelties. One of the first that fell a victim to his fury was the venerable Eleazar, a man of ninety years of age, respected by all for his great learning, probity, and zeal for his religion, and whose example had preserved a great number of Jews from falling into apostacy. Him they brought upon the butchering stage, and endeavoured to force him to eat swine's flesh ; and when they could not prevail upon him by any means to comply, they desired him, that at least he would, out of regard to his extreme old age, consent to eat some other unforbidden flesh, that they might make the king believe that he had obeyed. The good old man answered with a becoming courage, that the most dreadful death was preferable to such a base dissimulation, so unworthy his old age and character, and so dangerous in its consequence, since it might be a means of seducing many of his nation to follow his example. As soon as he had ended this speech, which was interpreted as the effect of his pride rather than of his zeal, he was haled to execution ; and when he was ready to expire under the strokes of his butchers, he gave a great groan, and expired with these words in his mouth, O Lord, thou knowest what pains I suffer in my body, from which I might have freed myself ; but my soul feels a real joy, because I suffer them for the sake of thy law<sup>k</sup>. After him the seven brethren, whose martyrdom is related in the same book<sup>l</sup>, suffered, one after another, the most exquisite torments with invincible courage and constancy, whilst their heroic mother, divested of all the weakness of her sex, stood by encouraging and strengthening them in the Hebrew tongue, with the assurance of a glorious recompence in the next life, for which she was, last of all, sacrificed to the tyrant's fury, and died with the same chearfulness, and intrepidity, which she had inspired into her seven sons (I).

(I) Josephus has likewise given us the history at large of those heroic martyrs, in a book by itself, which was intitled, Of the empire of reason. It is now better known to us by that of the book of the Maccabees; but as neither he, nor the author of the second book of that name, do expressly mention the place where this dreadful scene was acted, Rufinus<sup>a</sup> has taken it into his head, that it was done at Antioch (35), because they shewed their tomb in that city in St. Jerom's time, and had there built and dedicated a church to them (36). But as Josephus seems to believe that it was done at Jerusalem (37), and is followed by many learned men, and Rufinus gives no better reason than that of his tradition, we see no reason for following him, as some others have done (38); it being more likely that Jerusalem should be the place, where, above all others, the Jews shewed the greatest firmness for their religion, and consequently where such severe examples were thought most necessary by that exasperated prince.

Josephus, in the book above quoted, gives us the names of those seven brothers, and of their mother, whom he calls Solomona; but the Jews call her Hannab. He adds, that she flung herself into a large fire which was there kindled, to prevent the executioners laying their profane hands on her. The Latin version says, that she was dragged on the ground to execution, where having cut off her breasts, and scourged her naked body, they flung her into a boiling caldron. Rufinus is of the same opinion (39).

The Arabic version and Josephus Ben-Gorion, on the contrary say, that having lived to see her seven sons martyred, and lying dead on the ground before her, she flung herself into the midst of them, and prayed to God to take her out of this world; and that she immediately fell upon them, and expired. An antient poet

It was about this time that Mattathias, an eminent priest of the family of Joarib (K), began to signalize himself by his brave zeal for his religion. He had been some time before forced to retire to Modin his native place, to shun the sight of those scenes of cruelty and profaneness, which were acted at Jerusalem by Apollonius and the apostate Jews. During his recess there, Apelles, one of the king's officers, came to oblige the inhabitants of the place to execute his commands<sup>m</sup>. Having got the people together, with Mattathias and his five sons (L), he addressed himself to him on account of his dignity and the great esteem he was in, hoping, that if he could persuade him to comply, his example would soon draw all the rest. He made him in vain the amplest promises, that the king's favour and protection, both of him and his sons, would be the immediate reward of his compliance. Mattathias answered him, with a voice loud enough to be heard by all the assembly, that tho' the whole Jewish nation, and the whole world, were to conform to the king's edict, yet both he and his sons would continue faithful to their God to the last minute of their lives, and that no consideration should prevail on them to forsake the religion of their forefathers. In the mean time some of the king's officers had prevailed on some cowardly Jews to take another way; and one of them was just then offering himself to sacrifice to an idol, when the good old priest calling to mind what the law makes her die of excess of joy, in these words: Solverunt gaudia matrem (40).

(K) We have already spoken of this family, which was the first of the twenty four classes appointed by David to officiate at the temple (41); and was one of the four that returned from the captivity. Mattathias was the son of John, the son of Simon, the son of Asmoneus, from whom descended the Asmoneans (42). From this Mattathias descended the Maccabees, so famed in history for their zeal and bravery, and of whom we shall speak in the following section.

(L) These were Johanan, surnamed Kaddis, Simon, surnamed Thassi, Judas, called Maccabeus, and the most famous of all the rest, Eleazar, surnamed Avarani, and Jonathun, surnamed Apheus (43).

of Moses ordains against such transgressors, that they should be put to immediate death<sup>a</sup>, fell upon the man, and killed him upon the spot. His sons at the same time, being fired with the same zeal, killed the king's officer and his men, overthrew the altar and idol, and running about the city, cried out, that those who were zealous for the law of God should follow them; by which means they saw themselves at the head of a numerous troop, with whom they soon after withdrew into some of the deserts of Judæa. These were presently followed by great numbers of others, who, to avoid persecution, flocked to him from other parts of the country<sup>b</sup>; so that the deserts of Judæa were filled every-where with them.

As soon as Mattathias and his men were come into a place of safety, they set themselves on consulting the best means for standing on their defence. Here the remembrance of those of their brethren, who had suffered themselves to be butchered by their enemies on the sabbath, soon made them sensible of their danger, unless they steered a different course; for as long as they continued in that scrupulous notion of non-resistance for fear of breaking the sabbath, they would be still liable to the same stratagems, and by that means, in a little time, be totally extirpated. Having, therefore, maturely weighed the matter, and consulted other learned priests and rulers that were come over to him, it was resolved, that, for the future, it should be lawful, nay obligatory, to take up arms in their own defence, whenever they were attacked, on the sabbath as well as on any other day<sup>c</sup>. This decree, having been privately communicated to the Jews in and out of Palestine, together with their reasons for passing it, was universally received by all; and from that time they made no difficulty to defend their lives and properties, at all times, and upon all occasions. Among those who resorted to, and did not a little strengthen, the little flying army of Mattathias, were the Assideans, or rather Hassideans, a brave and strenuous sect, formed among the Jews soon after their return from the captivity. We have already given some account of them in a former volume<sup>d</sup>; the rest the curious reader may find in the margin (M). These being known to be the most strict strict observers of the Jewish laws and traditions <sup>9</sup>, their example did very much influence the rest in the late decision, and encourage them to set aside their scruples about the sabbath, whenever the safety of their lives came in competition with the observance of it.

Mattathias having by this time strengthened his little army with these and other stout and religious men, who daily resorted to him, began to come down with them into the plains, and to try his force not only against their persecutors, but also against his apostate brethren. As many of these as he caught, he put to death; the rest, in much greater numbers, he forced to fly into foreign countries, to secure themselves from his resentment. Having once injected an universal fear on all his enemies, he marched from city to city, overturned the idolatrous altars, opened the Jewish synagogues, which had till then, been either shut, or appropriated to other uses; made a diligent search after all the sacred books which had escaped the fury of their enemies, and ordered fresh copies to be written of them; caused the reading and expound*meum* and tuum *. They differed likewise from the Zaddikim their opposite sect, in that these contented themselves with observing all that was written in the Mosaic law, without troubling themselves with the traditions, comments, and constitutions of the elders; whereas the Assideans insisted upon a strict observance of all.

Scaliger supposes them, not without some good reasons (44), to have been rather a fraternity than a sect of Jews, who had given themselves up more strictly than the rest to the service of the temple, to the keeping up the repairs of that place, and the divine worship in it. To this end, besides the half shekel which every man was to pay towards it, they contributed other voluntary sums. They likewise sacrificed every day, except that of the grand expiation †, a lamb, besides those of the daily sacrifice; and this was called the sin-offering of the Assideans. They practised greater hardships and mortifications than the rest, and their common oath was, by the temple. To their zeal and love for that sacred place, now polluted and profaned, was owing their coming to Mattathias, and that courage which they shewed from thenceforth under him and his brave offspring; for the book of the Maccabees expressly says, that they were mighty men of Israel, and wholly devoted to the law. Whether the sect of the Essenians, or any other, sprang from the Assideans, we shall have occasion to speak in another place.

ing of the scriptures, prayers, and other parts of divine worship to be resumed (N), and all the males born since the persecution to be circumcised<sup>r</sup>. In all these God blessed him with such success, that he had extended this reformation through a considerable part of Judæa, within the short space of one year; and had, in all likelihood, gone through with it, even to Jerusalem, where the strongest Syrian garison was kept, had he not been prevented with death. But what he left unfinished, was soon after perfected by his worthy sons, especially by Judas Maccabeus, of whom we shall speak more fully in the next section.

IN the mean time Mattathias, finding himself quite worn out with age and sickness, called his sons together, and spoke to them to this effect. Hitherto pride and oppression have been suffered to prosper over us, for a punishment of our sins; but now be ye valiant and zealous for God's laws, and fear not to expose your lives in defence of God's covenant with your forefathers, if you expect the reward promised to it. Call to your remembrance the obedience of Abraham, the faithfulness of Joseph, the zeal of Phineas, Caleb's courage, David's constancy, Elijah's zeal, and the intrepidity of Daniel and his faithful companions. Let their miraculous deliverances inspire you with a sure trust in the Almighty's protection. Be not discouraged by the threats and weak ef-

(N) We have already taken notice, that the king's prohibition extended only to the five books of Moses; which had therefore been taken away from them, and been either burnt and destroyed, or polluted with blood, swine's broth, idolatrous pictures, and other such defilements, which rendered them unfit for future service, and to which therefore he substituted new ones, which he caused to be transcribed from the best copies

But this had not obstructed the lecture of other sacred books, the Prophets and Hagiographa, amongst those who had persisted in the exercise of their religion, and who then substituted these to the pentateuch; so that when the public worship came to be restored, and the law to be again read and expounded as formerly, they still retained also the reading and explaining of the other books; and this occasioned double lessons, one out of the law, and the other out of the prophets, &c. which continued ever after; and for the understanding of which, new targums or paraphrases in the Chaldee were compiled by proper persons, as we have elsewhere hinted in this chapter*.

forts of the greatest men, who, though they seem to triumph now, will shortly be cut off, and become the food of worms; but arm yourselves with courage in defence of our laws, liberties, and religion, and you will not fail of success. Simon, your eldest brother, has always shewed himself a man of consummate wisdom; let him supply the office of a father and a counsellor, and do nothing without his advice. Judas is well known to you all for his valour and conduct; let him be your general, and lead you against your enemies. And may heaven crown his and your valour with glory and success. Having thus said, he expired in a good old age, and was buried at Modin with his ancestors, greatly lamented by all the faithful in Israel (O). He was, according to his desire, succeeded by his brave son Judas in the command of the army; and by him the Jewish religion and state were soon after restored to their antient splendor, as we shall see in the next section.

(O) The first book of Maccabees doth barely tell us, that he died in the one hundred and forty sixth year, without mentioning whether of his life, or of the æra of the Seleucidæ. Some therefore have taken it in the former sense; but the far greater part in the latter; for the one hundred and forty sixth year of the kingdom of the Greeks falls exactly with the Julian year 166 before Christ, which is the year in which he died (45).

His deciding the point about the necessity of taking arms on the sabbath, has made several learned men, both Jews and Christians, fancy, that he had been high-priest of the Jews (46); but it is plain he did not determine the case by his own authority, but by the advice of such learned men as were with him; neither doth the book of Maccabees or Josephus say any thing of this imaginary dignity. It appears on the contrary, that Menelaus was still alive, and in credit at the court of Antiochus, and was succeeded by his brother Alcimus, of whom we shall speak in the sequel.
